I have not uttered these remarks, Mr. Chairman, in imitation of the avowed purpose of my colleague, (Mr. H. NELSON.) I have no motive to arouse the dormant feeling of party. My doctrine had once a party to sustain it, but that day has passed away.

The example of Virginia has, indeed, effected a great revolution. I do not know but that I stand alone in this House, when I deny the right of any State government whatever to accelerate or direct by its eulogies or its instructions, to retard or defeat by its denunciations or its resistance, the regular operations of the National Government. There remains not now, however, a solitary State which has not, in some form or other, exercised this power, nor one, I might add, which has not had cause to repent it. The practice may be traced to that celebrated argument to which we have been so often referred for authority in this debate; which, in its outset, rests the sanction of the Constitution on the assent of the States, rather than that of the people, and, in narrowing the foundation of the National Government, has endangered its stability. To the same spirit which expounded the Constitution, as a compact among the States, and asserted, for their ordinary Legislatures, the right to settle its true import, may be distinctly traced the present opposition to the exercise of that Federal power which constitutes the subject of our present deliberation.

But my colleague, who has so ardently appealed to this ancient feeling as a test of political truth, has overrated the magnitude of the question to which he invites its application.

We mean not to prostrate the jurisdiction of the States over their own soil. We only deny that it is exclusive. Each State government will retain a concurrent jurisdiction with the United States, over the surface of every national road or canal within its territory; and will exercise sovereignty to the same extent as the latter, or to the full extent of its Constitutional authority. Even soil may not be permanently alienated from its former proprietor by its condemnation or purchase for public use. I need not inform my colleague, (Mr. H. NELSON,) who once adorned the bench of justice over which he presided, that the right of soil as well as jurisdiction, the title of the citizen as well as the sovereignty of the State, may be divided; the former between an incorporated company, for example, who acquire the conditional possession, for a special purpose, and the prior occupant who retains the reversion, and whenever that purpose fails, or the corporation is dissolved, may re-enter upon his soil; the jurisdiction between the General Government, who has constructed the road or canal for certain uses, and the States who, for every other political purpose, retain their jurisdiction unimpaired.

Nor let it be supposed, as another of my colleagues (Mr. SMYTH) has intimated, that any collision can hence arise, which might not result in a much more alarming degree, from the concurrent exercise, by the Federal and State governments, of many other Constitutional powers, universally admitted to belong to both, and extending over the same property and persons.

I have sought, Mr. Chairman, to sustain the authority of the General Government to construct roads and canals, for such purposes as seem to me to be expressly sanctioned by the Constitution. Should a majority of the Committee, however, deny this power, a part of the public benefit which would accrue from its exercise may yet be attained by the exertion of another authority, concerning the legitimacy of which less doubt may possibly exist; the authority of appropriating the public revenue, so as to provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States. For every road or canal, which the public interest would prompt the National Legislature to provide for, may be comprehended within the general description furnished by the Constitution of the objects to which the revenue of the United States may be applied.

This authority would not embrace the power of condemning the soil of a citizen for public use, nor confer any jurisdiction over it when purchased, with his voluntary consent, which the Federal Government did not before possess. It must be exercised for the purpose which is now proposed, either in dependence upon the will of the proprietor of the soil or of the State in which it lies.

Yet, as some objects of great national importance have been, and many more might be accomplished, even by this subordinate power, allow me to endeavor to corroborate the arguments by which it has been sustained, and to notice some of the objections which have been urged to disprove its existence.

The 8th of the Articles of Confederation provided "all charges of war, and all other expenses incurred for common defence and general welfare, and allowed by Congress, should be defrayed out of a common treasury." The residue of the article describes how that treasury should be filled.

An enumeration of the powers of Congress next succeeds, in which they are authorized to ascertain the sums of money necessary to be raised, for the service of the United States, and to appropriate and supply them for defraying the public expenses. The last clause is immediately followed by one which grants the "authority to borrow money."

Here is no limitation whatever of the objects of general expenditure, and, accordingly, under the Confederation none was ever imagined to exist. In a report of the committee of Congress in 1782, consisting of Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Madison, and Mr. Fitzsimmons, all of whom were members of the convention which subsequently framed the Federal Constitution, and the first two authors of the best exposition of that Constitution now extant, it is declared that, "this provision of the Confederation comprehends an indefinite power of prescribing the quantity of money to be raised, and of appropriating it when raised."

The first clause of the section of the Constitution which enumerates the general powers of Congress, and confers, as I contend, that which I am about to maintain, is as closely copied from the Articles of Confederation as the different revenue systems of the governments would admit. It provides that Congress shall have power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." To this, also, directly succeeds the authority to borrow money.

The sole purpose of this clause, like that of the 8th article of the Confederation, and of the part of the 9th, which I have quoted, is to provide for the creation and disbursement of revenue. The power to appropriate the public money is nowhere else given; and is here as indefinite as it was under the Articles of Confederation, from which this clause was obviously derived. For what object was the language of the Articles of Confederation borrowed by the authors of the Federal Constitution, if not to confer an equal authority over the public purse? It was surely not designed to restrain the new Government, in relation to a power, which, however indefinite in theory, under the old, had been found very limited and defective in practice.

If this clause has ever been so construed, as to extend the powers of the General Government to other objects than the collection and appropriation of the public revenue, those who have resisted that construction have as obviously run into the opposite extreme, and narrowed its just import.

It has been asserted by one of my colleagues, (Mr. SMITH,) "that this clause confers no additional powers to those contained in the subsequent clauses of the same section." Another, (Mr. BARBOUR,) has inferred "that the Committee of Roads and Internal Navigation have yielded the point, that this clause does not enlarge the objects to which the public money may be appropriated."

The Constitution, Mr. Chairman, cannot be shorn of its rightful authority, by the concessions of our friends, any more than by the assertions of our opponents; and, in sustaining the practical construction of this power of the Federal Government from the dawn of American Independence to the present day, I shall fearlessly encounter every authority.

Were the construction, however, which our opponents have put on this clause, correct, it would leave yet unimpaired the power of appropriating the dividends of the stock held by the Government in the Bank of the United States, and the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, neither of which fall within the description of those sources of revenue which are embraced by this section; and both of which would consequently remain subject to the provision of another clause of the Constitution which I shall presently have occasion to notice.

But whence, let me ask, do our opponents derive their limitation of the power of Congress to appropriate the public revenue? Congress have power, we have seen, "to lay and collect taxes; to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare;" under no other restrictions except "that all duties, excises, and customs shall be uniform;" "that no duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State," nor any "direct tax imposed, but according to a prescribed ratio among the several States."

Why does this language extend beyond the authority of laying and collecting taxes? Not to provide for the payment of the debts of the nation. For that obligation of good faith, so far as respected existing debts, the Constitution, elsewhere, expressly provided; and from the subsequent power to borrow money, that of returning it, when due, would have been necessarily inferred.

Why describe the objects to which the revenue may be applied, and impose an obligation to provide for them, unless the power of appropriating the public money to those objects was also designed to be granted? Shall we render nugatory a clause of the Constitution, from a fair construction of which it is conceded, by almost all our adversaries, that much public benefit may be derived?

They are prepared, however, to meet this interrogatory with another. It is confidently asked, "why should a specific enumeration of any other powers of Congress immediately follow this clause, when every power would be embraced by an authority to provide for the common defence and general welfare?" My construction of the clause affords an easy solution of this inquiry. The powers delegated by it are restricted to the collection and application of the public revenue. Many, indeed the far greater part of the powers subsequently enumerated, require for their exercise no appropriation of money whatever. The very few which do require such auxiliary aid, are the most important of them all, as "to raise and support armies," "to provide and maintain a navy;" and they involve the necessary exercise of many powers, which the mere authority to appropriate the public money does not comprehend. The latter furnishes but one means of attaining the common end of all the powers of Congress, the general welfare. It may be employed for this purpose either singly, or in conjunction with other powers, alike necessary to this primary and ultimate end of all Government.

The defect of the argument which I have sought to answer arises from a supposition that any construction of the clause in question, which extends its import beyond the power of levying taxes, asserts a title to every power whatever, tending in any degree to provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States.

For myself, sir, I totally disavow any such construction. I ask for Congress but the authority, expressly delegated by this clause, to lay and collect taxes, and, when thus collected, so to apply them as to provide for the safety and welfare of the Union.

Far from being the unbounded authority at which so much alarm has been expressed, it carries along with it several obvious limitations. The end to be obtained by it must be one of common defence, or of general welfare; it must also be one which requires the appropriation of money; and Congress can then no further participate in its attainment, in virtue of this power, than by contributing towards it the public money.

It cannot be contended that this power is rendered unnecessary by that contained in the last clause of this section—"to make all laws which are necessary and proper for carrying into" effect the powers expressly delegated to Congress. The former is a primary and independent power; the latter but secondary, or auxiliary. Had the latter not been expressed, there can be no doubt (to use the language of Publius) "that it would have resulted to the Government by an unavoidable implication," as it did under the Articles of Confederation. It was inserted in the Federal Constitution to obviate, not to create, doubts. But, if deemed essential, this authority extends beyond that in question, and comprehends the power to pass other laws, as well as acts of appropriation. It suffices for my present purpose, while it also obviates an objection of one of my colleagues, (Mr. SMYTH,) that among those acts it expressly authorizes all such as are required for the exercise of the power contained in the clause which I have endeavored to expound. Both clauses resemble each other in one quality, which our adversaries seem to disregard: they were designed to enlarge, rather than to abridge (as is contended) the Constitutional powers of Congress.

15th CON. 1st SESS.—42

A constitution of government—the offspring of mutual concession among a people jealous of their freedom, and divided into many distinct sovereignties, alike jealous of their authority—ought not to be construed as a treatise of political philosophy—the production of one scientific mind. We cannot be surprised at finding its language redundant in the delegation as well as the limitation of power. Of this, the particular section on which I have just commented affords several examples. The powers to provide and maintain fleets and armies are embraced in the more comprehensive authority to declare war, the power to borrow money, and in that of paying the debts of the nation. Yet, all these powers are separately and expressly delegated.

I claim no more, Mr. Chairman, in support of that for which I now contend, than that a power as expressly delegated as any of those which I have enumerated, shall not be subverted by any rule of construction whatever.

This power has been exercised from the very foundation of the Federal Government, not merely in the purchase of lands for a variety of purposes, more or less intimately connected with the convenience of the Government, or with the military defence and commercial prosperity of the United States. It has been substantially applied (as has been already remarked) to the encouragement of domestic manufactures, and (in a form less disguised) to the promotion of foreign emigration; the advancement of agriculture; the cultivation of science, literature, and taste; the diffusion of sentiments of patriotism, benevolence, and piety.

The ingenuity of our opponents has not condescended—and surely will not—to distinguish between the release of a debt due to the Treasury, and the appropriation of a sum already collected, in favor of an object of general welfare.

One of my colleagues (Mr. SMYTH) has consistently pushed his doctrine of construction to its proper extent. He has denied the constitutionality of the appropriations hitherto made to the Cumberland road, as well as that to the relief of the unfortunate sufferers of Venezuela. The same candor will extend this sentence of condemnation to all the pensions which have been granted, and to all the rewards of valor which have been bestowed by the Federal Government; not only to the whole tariff, but to the institutions in general, to the genius and character of the nation.

There remains, Mr. Chairman, one other clause of the Constitution, hitherto unnoticed in this debate, to which I beg leave to call the attention of the Committee, in support of the Constitutional authority for which I have last contended. The second clause of the third section of the sixth article confers on Congress a power not enumerated in the section over which we have just passed. It is, "to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States." The first branch of this authority was designed, as will appear from the context of the whole section, to enable the Federal Government to regulate and dispose of its own territory, according to the suggestions of the wisdom of Congress; the second embraces a similar power over all other national property, and consequently over the surplus revenue to be found at any time within the public Treasury.

The obligation, as well as the power, of rendering productive such portion of the revenue as the public exigencies do not require, and as cannot without considerable loss be applied to the redemption of the public debts before they are due, is clearly deducible from this clause of the Constitution.

This surplus must otherwise lie idle in the public Treasury; a Treasury which, in fact, exists in contemplation of law. It must remain in the hands of collectors and the public officers, or be deposited to the vaults of some bank, and, in both cases, be exposed to all the hazard, without retaining the profit, of a loan.

Can it be questioned that such portion of the public money may be constitutionally applied to the purchase of the stock of a canal or turnpike company, as it had already been to the stock of a bank, under such rules and regulations as Congress may prescribe?

I do not contend, in virtue of this clause, for the power to establish a banking or any other chartered company; but for the simple authority to invest, by exchange, or sale, one species of property into another, for the public benefit.

If the imposition or continuance of public taxes, with a view to such an object, be deemed a measure of doubtful right or expediency, no such doubt can arise, as to such an application of the sum now proposed to be appropriated, or of the proceeds of the sales of public land, to which this section of the Constitution directly applies.

Although, under no Constitutional obligation to look beyond the profit which might attend any such application of the public money, Congress might, and undoubtedly would, blend with that consideration other objects of general advantage. As individual subscribers to the stock of all canal and turnpike companies usually extend their views, even in pursuit of profit, beyond the expected dividends upon their stock, to the beneficial end of its application; so the Government may often confidently anticipate a benefit, far surpassing in value any pecuniary profit on its stocks, from the success of a public work of general utility. In all such acquisitions of stock, it will regard the convenience and safety of the nation, and if the former has a price, the latter unquestionably has none.

This mode of applying the public money, to the structure of roads and canals, is liable to none of the objections urged by one of my colleagues (Mr. SMYTH) to the expediency of passing the resolutions before the Committee.

Indeed, when the general purport of the resolutions is considered, these objections must appear to himself premature, since they apply rather to the details of a system anticipated by him, than to the resolutions themselves, which merely propose to constitute a fund for internal improvement.

My colleague cannot deny the possibility of forming a system which shall combine individual sagacity, enterprise, and skill, with the national wealth, for the attainment of the far greater part, if not all the objects, upon which this power of appropriation would be exerted. He has not only beheld, but recently co-operated in the execution of such a system, in the State which we both represent. The characteristic feature of that system is, that to every public work, deemed by the legislature worthy of their patronage, and to which three-fifths of the stock necessary to complete it shall have been previously subscribed by private individuals, the State subscribes the remaining two-fifths, with a proviso that the total profit of the stock shall exclusively belong to the individual subscribers, until they shall have received legal interest upon all the sums which they may have advanced; after which the State participates with them in the dividends of the common stock. The subscription of the State operates as a moderate insurance against loss to private adventurers, who are expected to be attracted to all such enterprises, principally by the hope of gain; and is thus calculated to elicit the subscription of individual wealth to public use. While the State regards herself as amply remunerated for a temporary suspension of the interest on her share of the common stock, by the accomplishment of a public work, calculated to replace this interest at some future period, and to augment, in the interim, her wealth and population.

This system is not more susceptible of application to the circumstances of a single State, than of the United States. It would only be necessary, in order to extend the scale, to extend also the means of its application.

I would reluctantly appropriate any part of the public revenue to roads or canals, without that security for their judicious, faithful, and economical completion, which would be afforded by associating, in their original structure and subsequent preservation and repair, the cautious sagacity, persevering industry, and unceasing vigilance, of private interest; although I am not prepared to say that there are no works of this description to which I would not subscribe, from the public Treasury, a larger proportion than two-fifths of the stock necessary for their completion; or that there may not be some connected with the common defence, which would be cheaply provided for, at the sole cost of the Union. Two of my honorable colleagues, (Messrs. SMYTH and BARBOUR,) to whose arguments I have so often referred, sought to discourage the smaller States from yielding their support to the resolutions before us, by suggesting that, under any equitable distribution of the fund, which it is proposed to set apart for internal improvement, but a very inconsiderable allotment would fall to their share; while the other significantly asked, "if Massachusetts would give five millions of dollars to New York or Virginia?"

Internal Improvements.

H. or R.

Sir, the question whether Congress have the Constitutional power so to apply the public money, ought not to be decided by such considerations. Its decision may, indeed, but its truth cannot be affected, in the remotest degree, by the manner in which the power that we seek to sustain, may be hereafter exercised. If the smaller States will receive but little, they require less than those of larger dimensions; and it should satisfy their justice, that what they receive will be in the exact proportion of what they contribute to the common fund. The first suggestion of my colleague reduces the fund to the least sum proposed; the last swells it to millions.

I acknowledge that I most earnestly wish to see it augmented to an extent, much beyond the appropriation contemplated by the resolutions on our table. And when a proper occasion shall offer, I will submit a resolution which I hold in my hand, to enlarge it by adding the proceeds of sale of all the lands ceded to the Government of the United States by the Commonwealth of Virginia. The propriety of thus enlarging the proposed fund has been suggested to me, as well by the general policy of such an augmentation, as by the express terms of the Virginia act of cession, to which the United States were a party. There is, in this compact, a reservation of "all the ceded territory, as a common fund for the use and benefit of the several States, including Virginia, according to their respective proportions in the general charge and expenditures set forth in the Articles of Confederation," which would be found, on comparison, to correspond very nearly with that ratio of distribution, provided by the act of the last Congress creating a fund for internal improvement, to which the late President refused his assent.

The compact solemnly subjoins to this reservation, that "this fund shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for the purpose set forth, and for no other purpose whatever." The maxims of good faith, and a positive provision of the Federal Constitution, enjoin upon Congress the fulfilment of this stipulation; and no mode of giving effect to it would better accord with its letter and spirit, than a distribution of the fund among the several States, for the purposes proposed by the resolutions.

The sentiment, I know, Mr. Chairman, exists, and I regret that it does, that, if a fund be provided for internal improvement, it will be misapplied, to gratify local and sectional interests. An effectual security against such an abuse of power, would be created by a distribution of its annual revenue, in conformity with the proviso of the Virginia compact; and if the fund should be augmented to the extent which I have just proposed, such a division of it would not destroy its efficacy. It cannot be believed that there exists a single State in this Union, in which such a fund would not be required, or could not be judiciously applied. No part of America has yet reached a degree of improvement, which leaves its internal intercourse without a demand for an additional road or canal.

Although all the States, or even a majority of them, might not combine in devoting their respective shares of such a fund to one common object, yet some of them occasionally would, so as to obviate, in part, the chief inconvenience resulting from distribution.

Is it too much to suppose, that there exists throughout the United States a patriotism which would exult at the accomplishment of a connexion of the Lakes with the Hudson, by the means of the useful and noble work which New York has just commenced, or of that scarcely less important, though much less expensive connexion between the waters of the Ohio and the Chesapeake, which Virginia has so long contemplated?

To the smaller States, who are said to have least concern in the decision of this question, every new cement of an Union, essential, indeed, to the future prosperity and happiness of all its members, must be peculiarly interesting, since in any calamity, which might destroy this great bulwark of our common safety, they would be the greatest sufferers.

With regard to the general character of that power which we are now, I trust, about to exert, it must be universally acknowledged, that whatever tends to facilitate the necessary intercourse between the remote extremities and the common centre of so vast an empire, has the same propitious effect, as would result, were it otherwise practicable, from contracting the extent of its territory, without reducing its population, impairing its wealth, or narrowing its resources.

To the friends of American liberty, who justly regard the State governments as essential parts of a Republican system erected on a scale so extended as to constitute a cause of alarm, or who, with equal truth, consider our union as the bond alike of our independence and freedom, every measure which has the effect of diminishing the extent of the one, or of multiplying and strengthening the ties of the other, must be viewed with anxious solicitude.

For Virginia, so unhappily divided on this question, it should be enough to silence her objections, that, situated midway between the colonies of England and Spain, she constitutes the key of that expanded arch, which, stretching from North to South, binds the whole East in union, and sustains, upon its broad and lofty summit, our Western Empire.

Representing a district adjacent to the seat of the Government, I have personally, or in behalf of my immediate constituents, less interest in the decision of this question, than those gentlemen who come from the remote sections of the Union; but who can be insensible to the great purpose which should constantly animate all our labors; the preservation and improvement of that noble fabric of Government, under which it is alike our happiness and our glory to live?

Mr. BALDWIN followed on the same side, and spoke about three quarters of an hour in support of the resolutions.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, said, that he felt himself imperiously called upon to submit to the Committee his views on the Constitutional question involved in the resolutions under consideration. In opening this subject to the Committee, he had purposely avoided the discussion of the Constitutional point, as the report had submitted the views of the select committee, and a farther requisition from him would have only led to uninteresting recapitulations of what had already been advanced. He had, therefore, determined patiently to wait till the opponents of the resolutions had developed their arguments, and then to ask the indulgence of the Committee. He did not wish to shrink from the duty which had fallen on his lot. He did not wish to be chargeable with (what could not fail to grate upon the feelings of any honorable man) quietly standing by, and permitting others to fight his battles. Yet, so powerful and overwhelming had been the remarks of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Lowndes,) that he had been disposed to leave the question to the decision of the Committee, upon the unanswerable argument of that gentleman. His friend from Virginia, (Mr. H. Nelson,) had, however, by the character of his observations, compelled him to relinquish this desirable retirement from the contest. In the conclusion of his remarks, he had said, that he felt himself called on to pay some attention "to this report from the pen of his colleague." Whilst I tender to the gentleman my thanks for his attentions, I cannot but regret the unfortunate pre-eminence which has, on this occasion, entitled me to receive them. I have before said, and still feel, that the duty imposed upon me is too weighty for my feeble strength, but, however nerveless my arm, I shall not hesitate to defend myself from the attack which has been made upon me.

Sir, the gentleman from Virginia has done me too much honor in associating me with those two noble men; (the gentleman from South Carolina and the honorable Speaker,) in the modern triumvirate of which he has spoken. He has called us the trimmers of the times, and thus seems to compare us with the detested triumvirate of the Roman people. We are, doubtless, under great obligation to the gentleman for those high honors, which he so liberally bestows. It remains for us only to divide among ourselves this glorious spoil—to appropriate to each the character which belongs to him. In this partition, the great and commanding talents of my friends leaves to me the best title to the least obnoxious character. The fool Lepidus is not as detestable as the knavish Anthony, or the ambitious Cæsar.

But, sir, while the gentleman is so profuse in his compliments to us, he tells us of himself, that he is battling for the rights of the States, in this last struggle with the Federal Government. It is in this last of their fields that the liberties of the States are to be cloven down, and the Federal Government is to triumph over them. It is in this last field, that the gentleman represents himself as fighting their battles, with an almost desperate resolution. He is to be entitled, doubtless, to the distinguished appellation of the last of the Greeks, whilst he yields to us the bad eminence of a triumvirate. If impassioned zeal and great ability, in this great cause, can give to him so enviable a title, it must be awarded to the gentleman. He never "bore himself better" in his days. I always hear him with pleasure—I always confess his powers—but, on this occasion he has surpassed any former exertion. How unfortunate that this zeal was not as uniform as it was warm; and that, on former occasions, the same heroic prowess had not been manifested in defence of the rights of the States!

The gentleman told us the other day, that the nation would be in sackcloth and ashes, if this proposition should be successful. To-day he tells us, that he retracts the remark. He now hopes that the nation will arise in its strength, and put down those who advocate these resolutions. He no longer wishes the groans of the nation to be heard; he hopes for their reprobation. For these groans I presume he would substitute their hisses. Sir, there is no man who can feel more sensibly than myself the disapprobation of those who have favored me with their confidence. The distinguished honor I have twice received from them, without solicitation, cannot fail to render me peculiarly solicitous to merit a continuance of their good opinion. But as, on this occasion, I am not only left (from the absence of all instructions) to follow the dictates of my conscience, but am bound by my oath to construe this Constitution according to my judgment, I cannot apprehend their censure in following my convictions. They know well, that the first and most important requisite in a Representative is independence of mind; and I trust I shall never cease to evince to them that I am not destitute of this qualification.

But, sir, whilst I cannot be insensible to the disapprobation of the wise and good, I beg leave to assure that gentleman, that retirement has no terrors for me. A seat in this House is not so highly prized, as to induce me to surrender the honest convictions of my judgment to preserve it. Nor am I more alarmed at the intimation of the gentleman, that the report of the committee conveys a censure of the Executive. I appeal to the candor of any man, who will peruse that paper, whether any of its pages contain an expression that can be tortured into such a construction. None such was intended. But why, he asks, this discrimination? Why has no similar objection been made to former messages? I am not responsible as to them—but the reason for a discrimination seems manifest. A former Congress has actually passed a bill embodying the principles of these resolutions. A former Executive rejected this bill. When, therefore, there existed a fair presumption, that the popular branch might again act upon the subject, when the Executive intimates the futility of such an attempt—and when the committee were desirous of pressing upon the consideration of the House the importance and propriety of renewing the effort, it became unavoidable to meet and remove the objection then intimated by the President. In doing this, the course which has been pursued is believed to have been respectful and decorous—whilst it did not compromise the dignity of this House.

The gentleman, sir, has accused his adversaries of inconsistency. He complains, that we are deserting the great principles of the Republicans in 1798, and subverting the acknowledged rights of the States, by a construction too latitudinous. Not content with a single intimation of this charge, he has made it the commencement and the conclusion of his address. He speaks of the "great battle fought" in the early times of the Constitution, when the champions of the States were Mr. Madison, the late President of the United States, and Mr. Gallatin—"not the Lord Chatham of the ministry, but the Mr. Pitt of the Commons House." And on what great occasion did this celebrated conflict take place? It was on the bank bill! On the question of the establishment of the first bank of the United States, which was vehemently opposed by those two great men, arose, as he tells us, the great division of parties in relation to the rights of the States and the Federal Government. It was then that the strict construction of the Constitution was contended for, and those principles established, in relation to its interpretation, the correctness of which is not now contested, though their application is the subject of litigation. Bearing, then, in our minds this fact, that the bank question was that to which the gentleman refers, as having tried the rights of the States, let us see how far the gentleman himself is entitled to the applause of consistency, in the uniform defence of his beloved State rights. Sir, I shall press this matter upon the gentleman with no unfriendly feeling. I shall put it to him in the same good-humored spirit which animated him in his attempt to furnish evidence of inconsistency against my friend from South Carolina. I know the gentleman's constitutional good humor too well, and have too long experienced his friendly dispositions towards myself, to suppose, that his remarks, in relation to me, were intended, even in the warmth of his zeal, to injure my feelings. I shall, therefore, maintain the same dispositions towards himself. But, before I come down to the period in which the gentleman was a conspicuous actor, I beg leave to advert to a few facts in relation to the bank.

A few years before the expiration of its charter, its renewal was proposed; and Mr. Gallatin, then at the head of the Treasury, who had opposed its passage, recommended its continuance. But the gentleman tells us he was no more Mr. Gallatin of 1791, than "the Lord Chatham of the ministry was the Mr. Pitt of the Parliament House." But he was not destined long to remain alone in this change of his opinions. In a few years, the old bank charter having expired, the subject was again revived. The hostile cloud that had lowered in the horizon so long, broke upon us at length, and during the war a new bank bill was proposed and passed both Houses of Congress. When submitted to Mr. Madison, who has been justly styled the Champion of State Rights, he rejected it, not because it was unconstitutional, but because he did not regard its provisions as expedient and salutary. The Constitutional question he declared to be settled, by the acquiescence and approbation of the nation, and with a magnanimity and modesty peculiar to great minds, he yielded to the precedent which had been so decisively sanctioned.

And where was the gentleman then? In this second assault upon State rights, where was the great defender of the States? He was then in Congress. Where then was his zeal which has, on this occasion, blazed forth with such conspicuous brightness? Unfortunately for the States, it was in dim eclipse. He, too, voted for this bank bill—for the very principle on which "the first great battle, in relation to State rights, had been fought."

I know that the gentleman considers that vote as justified by the situation of the country. We were at war—in danger of subjugation—it was better to break this "sacred Constitution" than to be reduced again to colonial servitude. But will not the same principle justify the appointment of a dictator? And does the gentleman seriously believe, that it is better to construe this Constitution with so much rigor as to compel us to tear it in pieces during war, than to give it that fair and practical construction which will fit the necessities and wants of the nation at all times? Is it better to compel the Government, in time of war, to resort to the necessity which is above all right, or, by rational interpretation, to acknowledge a Constitutional necessity which can give right?

But this bank bill was rejected. The cloud of war was dispersed; the halcyon days of peace returned, and the tyrannous necessity of war was at an end. Another bank bill, in a time of profound peace, was proposed and passed by Congress, and received the signature of Mr. Madison. Where was the gentleman then? He was in Congress! Where then was his zeal? On the passage of the bill to a third reading he was unfortunately absent. He had no opportunity of distinguishing himself by his chivalry on that occasion. But, his good stars prevailed, and, on a motion to postpone the bill indefinitely, he was fortunately in the House. Here was a fair opportunity, in time of profound peace, and on the great question which had agitated parties in 1791, to recur to his principles, and put an end to the bill—and how then did he vote? He was not content even to be silent. He voted against the postponement, which was a vote decisively in favor of the bill. The gentleman now admits he was in favor of it.

Sir, I have heard an old statesman laughingly observe, that no man, who had been in public life five years, ought to be held to show, that he had been entirely consistent in his opinions. Five years, it seems, is a good bar to a charge of inconsistency. Perhaps it is under this novel statute of limitations, that the gentleman, who has long been in public life, may be considered as protected, while I, unfortunately, cannot repel his charge by a similar plea, as this is only the third year of my service.

Sir, I do not mean, by these remarks, to intimate anything improper in the course pursued by the gentleman, on the question of the Bank of the United States. On the contrary, I am persuaded of the purity of his motives, as well as of the then Chief Magistrate's, and, having voted for the bank bill myself, cannot materially dissent from them in my views of that important measure. But, when a gentleman, so able and so zealous in the maintenance of his opinion, pursues a course so utterly inconsistent with them, some indulgence may reasonably be expected from him for the supposed errors and inconsistencies of others. It is not for men whose path has not been direct and uniform, to charge upon others, so fiercely, their alleged deviations. It is not for them to call down upon their adversaries the censures of the nation, for fancied desertion of the principles of the Constitution.

In the construction of this Constitution, there is not, there cannot be, a system of orthodoxy. Agreeing, as we do, in principle, there must always be a variety in the application. The instrument conferring upon us incidental, as well as express powers, there must always be great differences of opinion, as to the "direct relationship," and "real necessity" of the necessary powers. Nothing can better illustrate it than the various shades of opinion on the question before us. Now are the opponents of the resolution more consistent with each other than we are. Three gentlemen from Virginia, who have particularly distinguished themselves in opposition, all differ in essentials. The first gentleman who spoke (Mr. SMYTH) admits, I conceive, all that I ask, in saying, that the revenues of the United States may be subscribed in stock to road and canal companies, "as a fiscal operation." But, neither of the other gentlemen will yield their assent to this position. The same gentleman contends that, as necessary of military operations, the executive and military authority may make military roads in time of war, but the legislative body cannot authorize them. His colleagues disagree with him. On the other hand, another of these gentlemen (Mr. BARBOUR) admits "the right of way," as necessary to the power to establish post roads; but his colleague (Mr. NELSON) denies it. This last, in his turn, justifies the construction of the Cumberland road, which his friend (Mr. BANNOUR) utterly disclaims. Sir, with these things before your eyes, who shall pretend to say what is orthodoxy—what is heterodoxy? It is impossible. It remains for us to act according to our consciences, without attempting a conformity to any particular sect or persuasion.

I should not have troubled the Committee with these remarks, but for the course of my colleague's observations. He has endeavored to excite alarm and apprehension. At what? What is this dangerous measure that has so much excited him? The improvement of the country! In what manner? Is it contemplated by any gentleman to enter the States by force—to make roads without their assent—to destroy the property of individuals, and to prostrate private and State rights? By no means. It is contemplated to do that which has already been done, without injury to any one, and to the universal satisfaction of the nation. It is contemplated, either to subscribe for stock, in companies incorporated by the States; or, as has already been done in relation to the Cumberland road, to procure the assent of the States to the construction of public roads of great national advantage, and to acquire from individuals the right of using their property for the purpose. This is the utmost that the friends of this proposition contemplate or intimate. Let it not, then, be said that the rights of the States are to be infringed, since their assent is to be obtained; let it not be said that private property is to be sacrificed, since it is only to be affected by their own consent, or under such State regulations as are common in relation to turnpike roads. No proposition can be more harmless—none can be more beneficial.

With this view of the plan in contemplation, let us proceed to consider upon what principles this Constitution should be construed. Shall we give it, what is called by a gentleman, a liberal construction, extending infinitely the powers of the Federal Government? Or shall we construe it with a strictness and rigor that will disrobe us of all the means necessary for carrying on the Government? Neither! In construing this instrument, I will not, on the one hand, extend its provisions too far; nor will I, like the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. H. NELSON,) who has denied the right of way, which even his rigorous colleague had admitted, act the part of a miser, who, in paying away a farthing, examines it with scrutinizing care lest it should turn out to be a penny. The inevitable effect of such a construction of the instrument will be, that the Government must either fail of its great objects, or that it will be habitually broken whenever the pressure of events shall seem to require. It is better to give to it a plain, practical construction, that shall suit the necessities of the nation, in peace or in war, than to attempt a rigorous adherence to the letter, which will compel innumerable infractions. Thus, to the nation, it would be less oppressive to admit, at all times, the right to make necessary military roads, with the assent of all parties concerned, than to resort, in time of war, to a necessity above right, and subversive of the Constitution, to make roads, ad libitum, without the consent of anybody.

Sir, the construers of this Constitution may not inaptly be compared to the dramatis personae of the Tale of a Tub. Peter, John, and Martin, represent the three sects of political interpreters. I have been solicitous to preserve the golden mean which is always so desirable. I profess to be of the good old Protestant persuasion of brother Martin. There are some gentlemen who, like Peter, are for adding shoulder-knots and lace to the coat, until you will scarcely know it again. There are others who, in the eagerness to remove what is obnoxious, in tearing off the lace, pull off —here a sleeve, and there a skirt, and strut about in all the rueful oddity of puritanical plainness. I will follow neither of these. I see nothing so technical in the language of this Constitution, as to induce me to give it a very technical construction. It is an instrument formed under circumstances of great and insuperable difficulties. It is a division of one sovereignty into two sovereignties—a division of the attributes of sovereignty between the States and the Union—each to be sovereign and superior to the other in its appropriate sphere. In short, it is, in some sort, an attempt to reconcile contradictions, and to effect impossibilities—to create two powers, each greater than the other—to define the boundaries of the two powers, when, in truth, they run into each other like the colors of the rainbow. Already have we had repeated and decisive evidence that, in spite of the great ability and wisdom which distinguishes this instrument, it is not free from that imperfection which characterizes all human institutions. Already, in the military and judicial departments of the Government, have there existed the most serious collisions. They must continue to exist until the construction is settled by practice and universal acquiescence. Will gentlemen attempt to bring into the discussion of a question like this, the principles of mathematical science, or the attenuated logic of metaphysics? The subject does not admit of it. You cannot lay down the powers of the Government with mathematical exactness. Plat down the boundaries of the two sovereignties, according to the principles of gentlemen, and a Kentucky land claim would not exhibit more embarrassing interferences. No, sir, it is not a mathematical, it is a moral certainty, that we are to expect on these great questions of political right. And how is this moral certainty to be better attained than by a practical construction, supported and fortified by the practice of the Government, and the uniform acquiescence of the nation, in analogous cases? This practice—this uniform acquiescence—these decisions of the nation, on Constitutional powers, which admit not of precise definition, but are rather to be referred to practical good sense and sound discretion—these, I say, serve as landmarks for subsequent legislatures. They are the buoys which the wisdom of the nation has fixed, to mark out the channel that divides the rival jurisdictions.

I do not contend, but have explicitly disavowed the idea, that we are bound by legislative precedents against the clear meaning of the Constitution. But I do contend, that when a principle has been long avowed and admitted, and acted upon, we ought not entirely to disregard it in deciding on a doubtful point. Do gentlemen suppose that if, which Heaven permit! this confederation of States shall last for a century, we shall, throughout that period, be continually moot-ing Constitutional points; holding nothing as decided; admitting no construction to have been agreed upon; and, instead of going on with the business of the nation, continually occupied with fighting, over and over again, battles a thousand times won? Sir, I have before cited the strong expressions, of the late able President of the United States and of the present Chief Magistrate, when Secretary of War, on the influence of former acts of Government, which have been quietly acquiesced in by the people and the States. There is, as might be expected, great good sense in their opinion. It is an opinion peculiarly correct, when applied to a Government, which, like ours, provides the means for its own alteration. If a power is asserted by the National Government which is conceived not to have been granted, or to have been improperly bestowed, the States have the power of amending the Constitution and prohibiting its exercise. Hence, when this power is not exercised though the question has been agitated among the States, it furnishes a fair presumption that the power has not been improperly asserted; it affords the best evidence, in all cases not admitting of clear and unequivocal exposition, of what is the true practical construction of the act of union. Nor is it at all a novelty that practice and acquiescence should receive so much consideration. They often form the Constitution itself. What is the constitution of Great Britain but a constitution founded on usage and long acquiescence? But, my friend (Mr. BARBOUR) says, that it may be altered by Parliament. True—let us come nearer home. Who made our State constitution? The ordinary Legislature. There was no convention. The gentleman on my left (Mr. H. NELSON) whispers that they called themselves a convention. If then, we call ourselves a convention, will it give us the power of altering the Constitution? By no means. What then gives validity to the Virginia constitution? What then makes her citizens look up to it with veneration, as the unalterable charter of the Government? The consent, universal understanding, and acquiescence of the people! It was formed in a moment of difficulty and danger, by the ordinary Legislature; it was promulgated as the frame of government; it has been acquiesced in as such, and is now as much the constitution of the State as the instrument we have sworn to support is the Constitution of this Confederacy.

It is true, that all sorts of precedents are not to be regarded. It would be absurd to speak of the alien and sedition laws as precedents. It would be absurd to attribute the sanctity of national acquiescence, to measures which were received with the deep-toned murmurs of national disapprobation.

It may not be improper, after these general remarks in relation to the spirit with which the Constitution should be construed, to say something on the subject of the terms "necessary and proper" in that Constitution. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) seems to think "necessary" means, absolutely necessary. [Mr. BARBOUR denied that he had said so.] Sir, I do not mean to mistake the remarks of my friend from Virginia; and, I hope he does not take amiss my mistake. We have known each other from our boyish days, and I have never felt for him any other sentiments than those of esteem and regard.

The present debate cannot lessen or affect these sentiments. It can only produce one effect—to increase my high estimate of his abilities by the wonderful display of his powers, which we have witnessed on this present occasion. Another gentleman from Virginia, however, has certainly adopted the idea that “necessary” must mean “absolutely necessary” by declaring that we can exercise no incidental power, unless, without it the grant of the express power would be nugatory. But, sir, if “absolutely necessary” means more than “necessary,” I ask, by what right gentlemen interpolate into the Constitution, which they construe so strictly, so important a word? Or how can it be said of any one man that it is absolutely necessary to effect the end; since, in almost every imaginable case, more than one man may be conceived of effecting any given object.

The gentleman (Mr. BARBOUR) certainly has contended that our right to make military roads is the result only of extremity—of an extreme necessity, which, by the laws of nations, would give a right to march through neutral territory. And can he really believe that, in relation to the power of carrying on war, we were intended to enjoy only the powers given by the laws of nations? He tells us we cannot cut a military road, unless our army should be placed in a situation from which we could not retreat without cutting one—and how shall it be cut when we are pressed by an enemy? It would be impossible—and thus it seems, to use the clear language of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWMEYER,) when it is practicable it is unconstitutional, and when it is constitutional, it is impracticable. In reply to the difficulties suggested in the report of the select committee, in relation to the transport of military stores and munitions of war, the same gentleman has said, that we might establish arsenals along the frontier where arms, &c., would be wanting; and that thus it was manifest military roads were not indispensable. My worthy friend from South Carolina, who has too much delicacy to speak disrespectfully of any argument, has yet so forcibly illustrated the impolicy of placing our arsenals and magazines within the jaws of the enemy, that I am satisfied the gentleman will perceive his system of construction to be impracticable and inconsistent with the wisdom and views of the framers of the Constitution. Sir, the gentleman has told us that, on our principles of construction, the instrument is nothing but paper and packthread. I will tell him that on his principles it is not even that. He shaved it away by his acute and ingenious mode of reasoning, until you may see through it. It is so attenuated as to be impalpable. It is of no practical use. The Government could never have been set in motion upon his principles. In short—this Constitution, which will not permit us to prepare for our defence against a foreign foe—this wonderful instrument, so much the subject of our admiration and so zealously defended by gentlemen—is, upon their principles, a miserable fortress, not one gun of which can be brought to bear upon an enemy, while its whole artillery is most admirably pointed against the garrison!

Sir, this doctrine of extremity may be, and has been, carried too far. It is not conceivable that the Constitutional necessity, which the framers of this instrument intended should confer right, must be that extreme necessity which is above right. It never could have been intended that we should be driven to extremity before we could act; that the public enemy must be upon us before we can construct a military road. Constitutional difficulties of this description, it would seem, are not confined to this body. In a certain great city, not a thousand miles off, and at a period not a hundred years remote, a great question arose on the corporation's constitutional powers to build a bridge. A bridge was erecting, and the abutments constructed for throwing a noble arch of stone over the stream which ran through the city, when, all at once, a scruple arose as to the power of making a stone arch. The bridge makers very fairly contend that as they had power to build the bridge, they possessed the necessary power of constructing the arch. But the constitutionalists very ingeniously and subtly replied, that as a bridge might be made of sills and sleepers of wood, a stone arch could not be absolutely necessary; and the power was therefore not given, unless indeed a case of extremity should exist which might justify it. Their counsels prevailed. A wooden bridge was erected, and the floods came, and the torrents roared, and the constitutional bridge was in imminent danger of being swept away. Then the constitutionalists were heard to cry out “the extremity has arrived, you may now construct the stone arch;” but, alas! it was too late! The workmen pronounced it impossible; and the members of the corporation, in looking on while the bridge was mingling with the flood, could but sigh at the reflection, that, by their singular charter, what was practicable was unconstitutional, and what was constitutional was impracticable!

I shall not pretend, Mr. Chairman, to pass over the whole ground which other gentlemen have so ably occupied in support of these resolutions. For this reason I shall not find it necessary to comment at large upon the meaning of the word “establish” in the post office clause. Whether “establish” means “construct,” may well be left to stand upon their arguments. I will however add these suggestions on this point: If the power “to establish seminaries of learning” had been given, would not that term have justified “the construction” of colleges, and the acquirement of collegiate property? If the power to “establish” post offices gives the power to rent or purchase post offices, which has always been exercised without dispute, is it not equally fair to understand the power “to establish” post roads, as giving at least the power to make them with the States' assent? I will also add, the Articles of Confederation did not authorize the establishment of post roads: it applied only to post offices. Why then were the other words inserted, if establish only meant to designate? The designation of the office was always a sufficient designation of the road. The argument derives, too, additional force from the consideration, that the words “and post roads” were not in the first draught of the Constitution, but were interlined.

For my own part, however, I am disposed to consider the power of improving the post roads rather as an accessory to the power of establishing post offices and post roads. I am inclined to this construction, because I am not disposed to strain the meaning of any term in this Constitution. I would assume indisputable ground. I do not find myself called upon at this time to say how far we can go, but I am satisfied with saying, confidently, that we can safely go as far as is contemplated. It is sufficient for me that we can constitutionally do what the public good requires, and I do not find it necessary to decide whether we can do more. Hence, I have already voted in the Committee, and shall continue to vote in the House, against those resolutions, which assert the power of Congress to construct roads and canals without the consent of the States. I confess myself, indeed, strongly inclined to the opinion that, in the exercise of these incidental powers, the assent of the States must be obtained. I stated to the Committee, the other day, some reasons for this opinion, and shall, before I conclude, touch upon the subject once more.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) seems to me to have conceded here the whole ground. He admits the right of way to be given by the post office clause; and he further admits, that a post road once established by Congress cannot be shut up by the State; though it may discontinue the road for all other purposes except the transportation of the mail. What, then, is the inference? Either that the State is bound to keep the road in repair for the use of the United States, out of the State funds; or, that the United States may, with their own funds, and with the State assent, put the post road in repair, (which is the position I contend for;) or, that the post roads of the United States may be permitted to go entirely out of repair, grow up into a wilderness, and become impassable, by which means the Federal Government can neither exercise the power nor perform the duty arising out of the post office clause.

This latter supposition cannot be contended for; and the gentleman may have his option as to the two former. For my own part, as a lover of State rights, I should much rather see the United States repairing the roads out of their own funds, than compelling us to repair them out of ours. It is not difficult to decide which would be the most dangerous invasion of State sovereignty.

The same gentleman has laid it down as a rule, that there must be a “direct relation” between the express power and the incident; and it is also contended, (though the position is entirely unsupported,) that the incidental power must not be greater than the principal. It is surely not difficult to show a “direct relation” between the duty of carrying the mail and the power to render the roads passable. How much less direct in its relation is the power of hanging a robber of the mail under the power of establishing the road! And, unless the life of a citizen is considered unimportant, it may also fairly be alleged that there is a greater disproportion between this power of hanging and the establishment of a road, than between the power of declaring and carrying on war, and that of making a military road with a view to its successful prosecution.

The two gentlemen from Virginia, however, (Messrs. BARBOUR and NELSON,) and particularly the last, have contended, that the following clause in the 8th section of the first article of the Constitution, proves that it never was intended that the Federal Government should acquire any right in the soil, in any of the States, except in the few instances there specified.

That clause is in these words: “Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation, &c., &c., and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings.” And gentlemen say, that had the Convention contemplated the right of this Government to acquire property, ad libitum, from the States, they would not have conferred expressly these trivial powers to acquire small pieces of property for certain specified purposes. The argument is incorrect. It is founded on a false conception of the passage. It is based on the supposition, that this clause gives the power to purchase forts, &c., when a slight inspection will prove that this is not true. The clause gives jurisdiction only; it does not give the right to purchase. On the contrary, it furnishes to us an irresistible argument, that the power of purchase was taken for granted; for the power is not given expressly anywhere, but the mention of it here, incidentally, only shows that its existence was, nevertheless, clearly contemplated.

Sir, this is not only the fair construction of this clause of the Constitution, but, I will proceed to show, that, from the commencement of the Government to this day, the Federal Government has proceeded upon the presumption, that it had a right to acquire property by purchase and by cession from the States.

I will first mention custom-houses, some of which have cost large sums of money; whether purchased under the power to regulate commerce, or the general power here asserted of acquiring property, the construction which justifies them is at least as latitudinous as that we contend for.

The Harper's Ferry purchase. We had the power to purchase the site for an arsenal, but we had not only purchased this, but two considerable tracts of land, one of which does not lie contiguous to the arsenal, but at some distance from it.

The property owned by the United States in this District. But as these, together with a variety of others, may be supposed referrible to some other power in the Constitution, we shall pass on to what is more important.

The purchase of Louisiana. Where will gentlemen, upon their principles of construction, find the justification of this measure? [Mr. NELSON rose, and referred it to the power of admitting new States into the Union. Mr. BARBOUR said, it had been referred to the treaty-making power, but whether right or wrong, it would not operate as a precedent for him.]

As to the clause admitting new States into the Union, it clearly refers to States to be composed out of parts of the United States. If not, yet there are two sufficient replies to the argument. First, that Louisiana was not admitted as a State, but as a Territory, the property of the United States. Secondly, that unless it be admitted, as we contend, that we have a right to spend the revenues of the Union for the national advantage, we had no right to lay out our money in the purchase of the State, even if we had a right to admit it into the Union. And, moreover, the right to admit the State could not, of itself, justify the United States in acquiring for the General Government the immense quantity of public lands which it holds in that Territory.

As to the treaty-making power. This is a still more unsubstantial ground to rest upon. For there is one principle which, in this House, we hold sacred; that whatever may be the treaties made by the Executive, we are not obliged to make the appropriation; still less can the treaty compel us to make an appropriation, which gentlemen tell us the Constitution does not authorize. But, it is further to be remarked, that the appropriation of two millions for that purchase, was actually made a considerable time before the treaty; so that, unless the effect can produce the cause, the treaty cannot be resorted to to defend the act.

The Committee will understand me as by no means arraigning these measures, which I deem not only Constitutional, but highly expedient and beneficial, but as contending that they cannot be justified, except upon the principle I advocate, "that the Federal Government has a right to purchase property for national benefit, with the national funds."

The next purchase I shall mention is the Mississippi, purchased from Georgia. To get rid of this difficulty, the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. NELSON) contended, that it had been conquered from Great Britain by the Union; that Georgia had no title to it; that it never was within the settled limits and jurisdiction of that State. The fact is mistaken, and the argument more so. The fact is mistaken. To a great part of the ceded territory the United States never asserted any claim; and I understand from a gentleman from Georgia before me, (Mr. COBB,) that a county on the Mississippi, called Bourbon, within the ceded territory, was laid off by that State before the cession. The argument is as incorrect as the fact is mistaken. If Georgia had a title, then we have purchased a title to land with our resources, which was the exercise of that very power in controversy; if not, then we gave to Georgia $1,200,000 for nothing. Now, if the Constitution does not permit us to lay out our money in acquiring property, or in giving aid to public improvement, I should be happy if the honorable gentleman will point out the clause which authorizes us to give away the public money, without any consideration at all.

The next case I shall mention is the Virginia cession, made under the circumscribed powers of the old Confederation. If a power to receive a cession of territory existed under that instrument, it cannot be denied under this. Under that instrument, the immense western territory of Virginia, conquered by her arms under the gallant General Clarke, was ceded to the Confederacy. Will the gentleman deny the title of Virginia? Will he, the champion of her rights, assert that she had no claim to this property? He will not, he cannot. Whilst, therefore, according to his argument, the Mississippi cession furnishes an instance of our giving away our money, without consideration, the Virginia cession affords an example of our receiving a valuable consideration, without giving away our money.

A strong inference in relation to this power of acquisition, from one of the Confederacy, is afforded by this cession of Virginia, made to the Union not more than a year before the adoption of this Constitution. If the convention had not intended this power to be exercised, which, under the still more narrow provisions of the Confederation, had been deemed legitimate, why does the Constitution contain no provisions inhibiting it to the Federal Government?

Sir, I do not call in question the validity of these cessions. I believe them Constitutional; but as they cannot be supported on the grounds assumed by gentlemen, and, as they disclaim the only principles on which they can be justified, it is to be hoped that, in fulfilling the important duty of supporting this Constitution, they will make amends for the errors committed, by receding to the States their respective territories. It is not enough for gentlemen to say "these precedents do not bind us. We do not justify these acts." It becomes their duty to repair the breach in the Constitution, by a prompt repeal of the unauthorized acts. If they will effect this, they shall, indeed, be called the defenders of the States. Georgia stands here ready to receive back her lands and give you your money again; and my parent State!—If you will only recede what she has lavished upon you, she will no longer be found begging at your doors for a little bit of land to discharge the just claims of her soldiers, of which they have been deprived by fraud or by mistake, in this very contract, whose validity is now called in question.

I will only add one other instance in relation to the United States acquisition of property. By the direct tax laws it has been provided that wherever there was default in the payment of the land tax, and upon the sale of the lands no person would bid the amount due, the land should be purchased for the use of the United States. The gentleman whispers me that they were directed to be sold again. But until the sale it was the United States property; and the resale may be made or not, according to the pleasure of the Government. Here, then, is a mode by which the Union may be gradually, yet constantly, acquiring property in the States. If, then, the gentleman's argument that Congress has exclusive jurisdiction over all the property it possesses, under the power to make "needful rules and regulations" be correct, here is a mode in which the most extensive exclusive jurisdiction is to be acquired within the States. But the deduction of the gentleman is incorrect. The fair construction of the clause he refers to, when connected with the clause in the 8th section on the subject of exclusive jurisdiction, does not give jurisdiction over property thus acquired. It only gives the right to make rules with respect to its disposition and management.

I shall not detain the Committee with the numerous instances in which the United States have acquired property within the States—sometimes with, sometimes without, their assent.* But, before I quit this part of the subject, I will beg leave to reply to the remarks of the gentleman (Mr. NELSON) on the Cumberland and Plattsburg roads. These works he has attempted (as I understand him) to justify. The Committee referred to the former, as an instance of the appropriation of the public moneys of the United States, to the construction of roads through the several States, with their respective assent. The gentleman justifies this work, while he opposes the doctrine that the Federal Government can appropriate money for the improvement of roads. How does he justify it? Does he contend that we can appropriate to those purposes the proceeds of the sales of public lands, but no other funds? If so, and if an appropriation of this character will solve his difficulties, let us appropriate these funds for internal improvement instead of bank fund. I shall be happy to receive his support to the proposition. But what difference, in principle, is there between spending on roads a dollar that came in through the customs, or a dollar produced by the sale of public lands? Or how does our greater command over the fund give us a right to acquire property in one way and not in the other? The gentleman tells us we bound ourselves, by a compact with the State of Ohio, to make this road. Can this compact justify the act, if it would have been unconstitutional without it? If such compacts untie the Gordian knot, then let us make compacts with the respective States to effect this desirable purpose of internal improvement. It is all that we require.

Sir, the Cumberland road cannot be supported

under the act of cession; it can only be supported on our principles. The act of cession provided "that the ceded territory should be considered as a common fund for the benefit of the members of the Confederation." The fund is thus placed upon the same footing with the other funds of the United States. There is not a syllable providing for or directing its application. The act which erected Ohio into a State, in directing the application of a part of these funds to the construction of roads, is not, therefore, justified by the act of cession, but by the general principle that we may expend our funds for the benefit of the Confederacy; and the acts authorizing the construction of the Cumberland road, (which have received the sanction of several Congresses and two Presidents, as also of the States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia,) having originated in the act last mentioned, can rest for their justification only upon general principles, and not upon anything peculiar in their character; or in the character of the fund which has been employed.

The road from Plattsburg to Sackett's Harbor has been spoken of in justificatory language. It is said the soldiers have been employed on fatigue duty in making this road. If we have the power to make roads, it is all I ask. I care not whether they are made by soldiers or citizens. Let us—if the calling our laborers soldiers will justify the act—increase the number and appropriate our funds for doing the work effectually. It is said three cents per day additional allowance is all that it costs the United States. Fifteen cents additional is the real sum. But is there any difference, in principle, between three cents and three hundred? It is said the road was there before. But is there any difference, in principle, between the right to repair the road, and to make it anew? If there be, and the former be Constitutional, let us all unite in appropriating funds to repair the existing roads. We shall have enough upon our hands in this view of the subject. It is said that this was directed by the military authority. And can the military authority, in time of peace, make a road without the consent of a State; when the legislative body cannot authorize it with their assent? Sir, I, too, approve the making of this road, but not upon these principles. I approve it, because we have a right to appropriate our funds to such purposes; because the legislative body did, by their appropriation of fifteen cents additional to the soldier's pay for this purpose, authorize the act; and because, although the State assent was not formally procured, there is every reason to believe it met with universal approbation.

I will not detain the Committee by enlarging on topics peculiar to military roads. There is no power in this Constitution more extensive than the war power. It never could have been intended by its framers, who had felt, through a long and often disastrous war, the evils of too limited powers, that this nation should, in such trying scenes, be handcuffed and manacled. It never could have entered into their views, that the Constitution only gave such rights, in relation to the marching of armies, as the laws of nations confer. They never could have intended that our armies should be placed in extremity before they could begin to cut a road for their retreat or accommodation. They were men of the world and statesmen. They knew that, as far back as recorded history extends, roads and bridges were essentials in military operations. They must, therefore, have intended that the power to make them should be vested in the General Government, as accessory to the power of raising and supporting armies and making war. And this, of itself, furnishes a sufficient answer to the argument of gentlemen "that if these important powers were intended to be given, they would not have been left to be inferred." If considered as fairly accessory to the war power, it was unnecessary, and would have been improper to specify them. The principle of exposition contended for, sufficiently evinces the prudence and propriety of avoiding an expression of what was considered as implied.

Sir, the events of the late war furnish us a lesson on the subject never to be forgotten. The transportation of our cannon to Sackett's Harbor cost us, it has been said, one thousand dollars a gun, and flour, in the Northwest, cost, at one period of the war, ninety dollars a barrel, on account of the difficulties of transportation. I have before me a history of the Western war, where I find it stated, that the extra expenses of transportation, proceeding from bad roads, would have built a fleet upon the Lakes, and that each wagon loaded with flour (never more than eight barrels to a load) was obliged to be attended by two others loaded with forage. I find, also, that to the dreadful state of the roads, which prevented the arrival of artillery at the river Raisin in time for that disastrous conflict, is attributed that dire event, at the recollection of which the blood in the veins of every American must run back to its citadel—the heart. [Here Mr. T. read, from the History of the Western War, passages on these subjects.]

But, an honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SMYTH) tells us, that the power of constructing military roads, at least in time of war, does belong to the Executive department of Government, but that the Legislative body has nothing to do with it. This is dangerous doctrine, sir, and not more dangerous than incorrect. How do they get the power? Is it expressly given? By no means. It is an accessory, it is said, and justly too, to the power of making war, and raising and supporting armies. But the accessory follows its principal. To whom, then, is the principal power given? To Congress; and if the accessory follows the principal, the accessory power of making roads belongs to Congress also. It is true, that if Congress makes war and puts an army into the hands of the President, necessity may sometimes compel him to exercise this power; but it is a necessity that only excuses an act which is irregular and at variance with the principles of the Constitution.

Having occupied already so much of the time of the Committee, I shall not take a view of the question as it relates to canals, except so far as it is connected with the extensive power over our revenues which this Constitution has given us.

This power "to raise money to pay the debts of the Union, and provide for the common defence and general welfare," is one of the most comprehensive in the Constitution. By the express terms of the instrument, there is no other limitation, except that the object of expenditure must either be for the common defence or general welfare. Indeed, in the nature of things, it could not have been intended by the convention to specify, in the Constitution, all the purposes to which revenue might be applied. There is nothing more entirely indefinite and general than the uses of revenue. Money, of no value in itself, except as it will command what we want, is capable of such an infinite diversity of uses, that to attempt to define its application, is to descend into the minutiae of human transactions. I cannot, therefore, conceive that it was the spirit and intention of the clause, to confine the expenditure of money to the objects specified in the succeeding enumeration of powers. The gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. JONES) has saved me the trouble, by his clear and logical argument, of showing, that, according to no fair principles of construction, can the powers "to borrow money," and those which follow in the same clause, be considered as dependent upon this general clause. They are all as independent of this as they are of each other. Each depends alone upon the commencing words of the section—"Congress shall have power."

But some gentlemen, fearful of this sweeping clause, as it is called, contend that there is a fair implication that the expenditure is to be applied to the specified objects; that upon any other construction the powers of the Federal Government would be as extensive as the wants of the nation, and swallow up all the powers of the States. I see no foundation for the implication, nor do I apprehend any danger of such an extension of power. While in relation to the "common defence," there can be no pretext for alarm, there seems to me not more reason for apprehension in giving to the phrase "the general welfare," in this clause of the Constitution, its plain and appropriate signification. We cannot exclude them from an instrument which we are told must be construed with so much precision. How then is this term "general" used? To indicate nationality; to point out that the object of the public expenditure must be the national welfare—the welfare of the Union as a nation—contradistinguished from the welfare of the States as members of that Union. Pursuing this plain and obvious meaning of the terms, there is no danger of the National Government insinuating itself, as has been suggested, into all those concerns which were unquestionably intended to be reserved to the States. It is only by attributing to the term "general" the idea of "universality," of which it is not here susceptible, that any foundation can be afforded for the alarm which has been expressed.

But those who apprehended so much from a construction of this clause, which would leave to Congress the unlimited disposal of the revenues of the Government, would cease to be alarmed if they would but reflect, that the unlimited power over our funds, does not imply, of necessity, a power to do everything to which these funds may be applied. My right to use my own funds at pleasure is always controlled by this obvious restriction, that I shall not acquire with them what belongs to another, without his consent. I have a right to lay out my money in the purchase of your property, if you will sell it to me; but my right to use my money does not take away your right to keep your property. The United States have a right to appropriate money to make canals, it is true, but this does not give them a right to seize the property of the States, and make canals without their assent. The power over our funds (unlimited except by the nationality of the object to which they must be applied) does not, therefore, enlarge our powers or diminish the powers of the States.

It is in this, I conceive, the error lies. Our adversaries now press upon us, what I presume to have been the Federal doctrines of 1798—that the power to raise money to provide for the "general welfare," enlarges the powers of the General Government, instead of merely leaving it a discretion in the application of its funds to objects that are national in their character. Such a doctrine would be dangerous indeed, and has therefore always been very properly repelled. But the right of applying the public money to national objects, limited and controlled, as of necessity it must be, by the rights of the States, is a salutary and Constitutional right. The first would give to the Federal Government the power of making roads and canals in spite of the States; the last only asserts the right to spend our money in improving the State property, provided the owners (that is the States) give their assent to the improvement. The first is subversive of State rights, the last admits them and respects them.

It is this view of the subject which is to my mind most satisfactory. If it be not founded in error, we have a right to subscribe to the stock of any road or canal companies, (whichever is the most desirable mode of effecting our object,) or we may, with the assent, and under the laws of the States, proceed to the construction of roads and canals; the rights of individuals being protected by their State Legislatures, and by the provisions of the 5th article of the amendments to the Constitution.

To illustrate this view of the subject, let me ask, if the United States had a deep national interest in the improvement of the navigation of the Appalachicola, from the Florida line to the Gulf, through the Spanish dominions, would they not have a right to expend the funds of the Union in that national object, with the assent of Spain? It must be admitted. Suppose they purchase Florida, and it becomes a State, and the national interest requires the same improvement in the navigation; can it be contended that, though we had a right to use our funds in improving a Spanish river, with Spain's assent, we cannot improve it when it shall become one of our own rivers, even with the assent of the State through which it passes? Again: It is said we have now an absolute right to apply the funds of the Union in making a road through Alabama Territory; can it then be contended that, when it becomes a State, this right to apply our funds will cease, even though the State should assent to the application?

It will be perceived that, in every view of this subject, I consider the assent of the States as a term in the proposition. I do not feel myself called upon to decide whether we may not even go further, particularly in relation to military roads. It is enough for me, that we can appropriate our funds to this object, which always implies the necessity of State assent to the execution of the work. I confess myself, however, inclined to the opinion, that, according to a fair construction of this instrument, State assent is a prerequisite to the execution of any permanent national improvement. The occasional construction in time of war of a road for military purposes, must always be justified, independent of assent. But it is justified by a necessity which sets right at naught, and does not therefore fairly enter into this discussion. I will, however, succinctly state, why I consider the Constitution as requiring the assent of the States wherever an incidental power affecting territorial rights is to be exerted.

In the 8th section of the 1st article of the Constitution before cited, where the power of purchasing property for forts, magazines, and dock yards, is incidentally mentioned, that power seems to have been contemplated as qualified with the necessity of obtaining the consent of the States. Then, I argue thus: If, in the casual mention of certain incidental powers affecting territory, (such as purchasing land for forts, &c.,) the framers of the Constitution manifest their understanding that they are to be considered as qualified by the necessity of procuring the assent of the States, it is fair to conclude that wherever incidental powers, which interfere with territorial rights are to be exerted, they must be subject to the same qualification. Now the right to make roads as necessary to the post office clause, or the war-making power, is an incidental right, and interferes with the territorial rights of the States. I conclude, therefore, that it can only be exercised with the assent of the States.

Nor let me be understood to contend that the assent of a State makes that Constitutional, which was not so before. I conceive the power to be given by the Constitution, but that, according to a fair construction, it is given with a qualification that the State assent shall be obtained before it can be exercised.

Such, sir, are my ideas of this Constitution, and of the question before us. I am satisfied that the construction which I have given to it, is not calculated to prostrate the rights of the States, or to consolidate this confederacy. No man can be more alive to the just rights of the States than myself. None can be more sensitive than I am as to the interests of my native State. But I am satisfied that the principles of construction contended for by gentlemen would render this Constitution worthless. So construed, it is an useless hulk upon the waters; worm-eaten, not seaworthy; and you could no more calculate on its bearing you safely over the tempestuous ocean of political affairs, than you could expect your gallant Constitution—the old Ironsides of your navy—rigged with a single mast, and her seamen armed alone with bludgeons, to return to your shores from the conquest of the Javas and the Guerrieres of the ocean, bearing aloft your flag amidst the acclamations of your people, and rendering your exploits the envy and the admiration of the world!

The Committee rose, obtained leave to sit again, and the House adjourned about five o'clock.

FRIDAY, March 13.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Henry Davis, which was read; when Mr. W. reported a bill for the relief of the said Henry Davis, which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS also made a report on the case of Thaddeus Mayhew, transmitted to this House by the Commissioner of Claims, which was read; when Mr. W. reported a bill for the relief of the said Thaddeus Mayhew, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act extending the time for obtaining military land warrants, in certain cases;" also, the bill, entitled "An act fixing the compensations of the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, and of the clerks employed in their offices; and the bill, entitled "An act to provide for delivering up persons held to labor or service in any of the States or Territories, who shall escape into any other State or Territory," with amendments to each; in which bill and amendments, they ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill from the Senate was read twice and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The amendments to the first mentioned bill of this House were read, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The amendments to the last mentioned bill were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. LAWYER, the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of correcting a mistake that occurred in the year 1808, in placing Captain Thomas Matchin, an officer in the Revolutionary army, upon the pension list, at ten dollars per month, when he ought to have been placed on the pension list at twenty dollars per month, according to the report of the then Secretary of War, and providing by law for the correction of such mistake.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the resolutions in favor of the power and duty of Congress to authorize the making of roads and canals within the several States.

Mr. PINDALL, of Virginia.—I had intended to address the Committee in an earlier stage of the debate, but, the silence which the deference due to more experienced members imposed on me, has been amply rewarded, for the chief grounds of argument on which I had intended to dwell have been preoccupied by gentlemen who have handled them with an ability to which I could not have aspired. I have risen, however, to notice some of the positions of those who question the power of this Government to apply its resources to the internal improvement of the country, by the construction of roads and canals—positions which have, probably, escaped the views of gentlemen with whom I shall vote, or, indeed, may have been noticed by them, but in a light somewhat different from the views I shall take leave to submit. Gentlemen on opposite sides, in this controversy, espy the Constitution of the United States in different and very dissimilar aspects. Whilst those who affirm our power to construct roads consider the Constitution as a modification of social compact, defining and conferring legislative powers; gentlemen on the other side, who deny the power in question, seem to be out of humor whenever the instrument is viewed in any other than its federative character, or, as an international convention, to be construed as a treaty between independent Powers. I will not undertake to deny the theorem on which several honorable members seem to build their arguments, to wit: that rules of interpretation, as applied to a fundamental social institution, or, to a mere treaty between sovereigns, are different as to their latitude of operation; and gentlemen (with my leave) may assume, that a treaty shall receive a more restrained construction, with regard to granted powers, than a social compact. But, on the other hand, all should admit that the Constitution of the United States is a compact both social and federal in its character. Hence, it might be supposed that we ought to interpret some of its provisions as clauses of a social compact, and others of its provisions as clauses of a federative alliance. And this, again, might introduce the inquiry, whether those texts of the Constitution, from whence we seek to derive the power in question, be social or federal in their character. I will, however, beg leave, for a moment, to consider our Constitution as a mere federative instrument, or treaty, between the twenty States of the continent; this being the view of that instrument which seems so congenial to the wish of those who oppose the resolutions.

H. or R.

The Constitution, then, as a treaty between the several States, is the object or subject of some common-place rules of construction, which, if not altogether self-evident, are so usual and universally acknowledged, that I should think it a mere waste of time to mention them were it not from a persuasion that indubitable results will be seen to flow from their recollection. It may be assumed as a primary rule, that terms or words found in treaties are to be interpreted in their received signification in the sense which custom has given them. Again, the custom which presides the interpretation is the custom of the time in which the treaty was concluded or drawn up; and, as language and the customary signification of words vary with time, it behooves us, in seeking the sense of treaties of past times, to know the common sense of the terms used at the time when the treaty was written; and this can only be known (according to national law writers) by the works of contemporaneous writers, by the contemporaneous acts of those concerned, and by early acts and interpretations by those who lived and acted in times less remote than ourselves from the origin of the treaty.

Here, then, we find a cure for what I consider as the error of my honorable colleague, (Mr. BARBOUR,) when he asserts that precedents are to have no weight in construing the Constitution. That gentleman insists that precedents are only to prevail in the technical proceedings of municipal courts, and are to lose all their virtue when applied to national compacts or treaties. In truth, the authority of precedents operates in an inverse ratio, when compared with the idea of my colleague, for the technical rule of the municipal court discards the force of precedent, unless the point quoted shall have been directly and expressly affirmed, denied, and solemnly adjudicated, otherwise the opinion of the most learned judge would be repudiated as an obiter dictum: whereas the deliberate, but theoretical disquisitions of those who had an opportunity of knowing the motives and objects of the parties are adverted to in expounding national pacts. The statesman or politician works with the same tools that employ the lawyer, and the difference is in his occasionally seizing other tools to which the lawyer is not entitled. The statesman may call his sources of information contemporaneous practice, or early practice, or more recent acts of construction acquiesced in by the parties, &c., yet, after all, (as I have remarked,) he only differs with the provincial lawyer in resorting to a more liberal and extensive use of what may be called precedents.

My colleague also supposes that legislative precedents prevail in the British Parliament, but ought to have no weight in this country. I agree that no act or decision of the British Parliament can furnish a precedent for us, and that, in questions of mere expediency, precedents can have but little, if any, weight in the legislative assembly. But, with regard to disputes of the boundaries of legislative power, I insist that a deference to precedents is the property of the Legislature of the United States, and not of the British Government. The British Parliament has no limitation to its legislative powers, consequently precedents can never be resorted to for the purpose of showing the precise extent or limits of powers which are confessedly unlimited. But, although the power of British legislation knows no limitation, the separate powers of the respective branches of that Government, in their relations to each other, are so limited as to prevent collision; and in adjusting questions of that limitation, precedents are quoted and are allowed their proper weight. Hence, it is seen, that, with the British Government, whenever boundaries of power are acknowledged, or certain limits prescribed, the doctrine of precedents, furnishing the beacons or line trees in the road of certainty, is necessarily attended to.

My colleague, in drawing lines of distinction between the Parliament and Congress, quotes it as a maxim of the British Parliament, that, whatever has at any time been done, may be done again. If the proposition, of which this maxim consists, had been affirmed by me, as a postulate in experimental philosophy, I think my colleague would have yielded to its truth. I presume, however, he quotes the proposition in a moral sense, and if he thereby meant, that whatever had been morally and properly done at any time, might be morally and properly done again, I would claim that maxim as the property of our Government. But there is no sense in which the maxim can apply to the powers of the British Parliament, for those powers being destitute of limitation, the Parliament may not only do again whatever has at any time been done, but may do what never has been done at any time. The structure of this Government has furnished a mean whereby the constitutionality of legislative acts may be tested. This mean administers itself through the instrumentality of the judiciary department. As laws are administered by the judiciary tribunal, it, in judging of the validity of those laws, and in deciding on their conformity to the Constitution, interposes as an umpire between Congress and the people. Now, all will admit, that the Supreme Court of the United States, in deciding the question whether a law be Constitutional, will give ear to the authority of precedents.

An appropriation of money to particular objects may be effected by a bill, which may happen to be carried into execution without passing the ordeal of an examination by the judiciary. But, after gentlemen admit that the judiciary may decide on our Constitutional powers, that the judiciary, in making that decision, will adhere to precedents, and, consequently, that precedents have authority whenever an impartial and learned umpire can intervene with its authority; will they contend that, in every case where peculiar circumstances enable us to carry a measure into execution without the aid of the judiciary, and where, of course, we must determine the validity of the power ourselves, precedents are to be rejected? How happens it that precedent shall have force in settling the validity of one Constitutional power, and be rejected when the question arises on another? Is it because in the latter case our ingenuity enables us to shun those scientific tribunals which the Constitution has created for its own preservation? My colleague (Mr. BARBOUR) warns us of the importance of the question now under discussion, and informs us that unborn millions will be affected by the consequences of the decision now to be had. But how are unborn millions to feel the effects of this decision, unless being had upon full and mature consideration, it be hereafter regarded as a precedent? Thus, the Committee may have observed my colleague rendering (as it might be called) his involuntary consent to the doctrine of precedent, at the moment when declaring his hostility to its authority. I have dwelt thus much on the topic of precedent, because I am convinced that the previous acts of this Government go to strengthen those who advocate the power of Congress; and because, not only my colleague, but other members with whom I shall have the honor to vote on this occasion, have assailed the legitimate authority of precedents.

The very able detail and commentary of legislative precedents and official executive opinions, which have been so eloquently dwelt on by my honorable colleague, (Mr. TUCKER,) exempts me from the necessity, even if I had the ability, of discussing them. Indeed the Committee must be convinced that the authority of Congress to construct roads, as far as the construction contended for can be supported by precedents, is fully proved. I will almost venture to assert, that gentlemen who oppose the power of Congress are ready to admit that the power is established, as far at least as it can be established by precedent; else, why has my colleague (Mr. BARBOUR) resorted to the unusual course of denying all authority of precedents—a position involving the endless absurdity of forcing us to ten thousand decisions of a Constitutional question, which, after all, according to his theory, would leave the same question undecided through all futurity? Else, why has another honorable colleague, (Mr. A. SMITH,) when speaking of the previous acts and executive reports of the Government, been driven to something like harshness of accusation against Albert Gallatin and others, in whom we have been accustomed to confide? a resort which, I know, was painful to my colleague, and could only have been justified in his own mind by the extreme pleasure which he felt from the authority of precedents.

The Committee will remember that the advocates of the power of Congress to construct roads, insisted that the authority to do so was comprehended in the express power to establish post roads. To this my colleague, (Mr. BARBOUR,) in further prosecution of the idea of the Constitution being a treaty, replies, that the right of this Government, with regard to post routes, is only a right of passage through the country, granted by the sovereign power of one country to the sovereign of another. But the chairman of the select committee has shown that a grant of the right of passage must comprehend the right of repairing or constructing roads through which it is necessary to pass. Vattel, in book 3, chapter 7, sections 130 and 134, in treating of the right of passage, as granted by one sovereign to another, informs us that it includes every thing, without which it would not be practicable; that the sovereign thus passing may, towards rendering the right effectual, even exercise some of the attributes of sovereignty whilst on the territory of his neighbor; for he may exercise military discipline on his officers and soldiers, and he is only bound to make a just reparation or compensation for damages occasioned by the operations of encamping, entrenching, &c. If this Government has only the right of passage, it must, by the principles of national law, have the right of repairing or constructing roads, without which that right cannot be exercised with convenience, and sometimes could not be exercised at all; and must also be entitled to exercise the attributes of sovereignty, which protects the exercise of the right. This would justify legislative regulations for the preservation of the roads she repairs, during the time of the continuance of this right of passage, which is coextensive with the duration of our Constitution. Every sovereign that enters another territory in his sovereign character, does so as an enemy or as an ally: if as an enemy, the rights of conquest entitle him to make and demolish roads at his own pleasure; if he passes as an ally, and by consent, we have seen that he may make or repair the roads of passage during the continuance of his right of passage, only repairing the damage occasioned thereby to others. And the fifth article of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States provides, that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. But these views involve us in refinements that are scarcely tangible, and my only apology for indulging in them is a desire to examine the ingenious arguments of my colleagues. In truth, the powers of the United States in relation to post roads have no resemblance to the mere right of passage; the latter is a transient advantage, ceasing the moment the party has glided through the country, whilst the former is an existing perpetual right. The one is the mere boon of hospitality, extended to a guest, whilst the other is the property of sovereignty, and is contained among the legislative powers granted to Congress.

But it has been said, that the United States have nothing but a right of way, on which the mail may be carried. I had not expected the advancement of this idea from my colleague, after the exceptions so ingeniously and eloquently urged against the admission of precedents, as too technical to have any place in the interpretation of the Constitution; for, no term can be more peculiarly technical, than the right of way—which is one of the ten incorporeal hereditaments, of which the common lawyers treat. This Government, then, is reduced to the consideration of a humble patentee, to whom Virginia has granted the right of carrying a mail on her roads. Carry this refinement out one step further, and it would follow, that, for any abuse of this right on our part, Virginia might repeal the grant by a scire facias, to be prosecuted on the chancery side of some of her county courts. Matthew De Quester, in the reign of James I. and afterwards Manley, about the middle of the 17th century, were English subjects, who held the post office as patentees. Matthew De Quester, to facilitate the passage of the mail, might have bargained and advanced his money to the turnpike companies, to induce them to improve the roads, or he might have agreed to work his own laborers on the roads. It is true, he could make no laws to govern such objects, because the power of legislation, in relation to the post roads, had not been granted to him as it has been to Congress—a body that claims not as a private grantee, but as a supreme power of legislation.

Internal Improvements.

Some of my colleagues would require this Government, on approaching the southern shore of the Potomac, to disrobe itself of the sovereignty with which it has been clothed by the people, and pass with the mail through Virginia, as any private citizen, yeoman, or beggar, may travel to mill or market. But a foreign sovereign cannot be subjected to the municipal laws of a country in which he sojourns. Nay; the laws of nations impose a duty on despotic Powers, as well as free Governments, to issue orders, or enact laws, which shall give security to the foreign sovereign, and exempt him from subjection to the civil laws. My colleagues then, who are so zealous of State rights, must see the necessity of having State laws to regulate and protect the rights of this Government, in relation to post offices and post roads; which State laws could not be enacted, unless by a resumption of legislative powers, which have been expressly granted to the Government of the United States.

My colleague, (Mr. BARBOUR) adopts an unwarrantable course of argument. If, said he, you have the right to construct roads you must have a right to take earth, stone, and gravel, with which to make them; but the Constitution gives you no authority to take these materials, and therefore you cannot construct roads. It is true, that the Constitution does not, by expressed words, grant the power to take these materials, but if it comprehends the power to construct roads (as I think has been proved by other gentlemen) then the proposition of my colleague admits, that the authority to take these materials is a necessary incident to the execution of that power. My colleague also says, that we have the power to build a navy, but that we have no authority to impress the mountain oak wherewith to build it. I will not stop here to examine the correctness of this assertion; nor will I consume your time by the inquiry, whether timber is not as essential to the building of a navy, as stone and gravel are to the construction of a road. But I must take leave to submit to my colleague this inquiry—whether, if this Government has power to build a navy, without the power to impress timber, it may not also have the power to construct roads, without the authority to impress stone and gravel?

If the power of Congress to establish post roads comprehends neither the authority to construct or repair roads, nor any jurisdiction over such roads, the United States' Government will be obliged to carry the public mails on the roads provided by the respective States. Being thus obliged to perform this duty, upon the State roads, I pray you to solve this inquiry: Is this Government, in transporting the mail, to be confined to the public roads of the State, or may it use the private ways and roads also? If this Government be confined to the public roads, it follows, that, inasmuch as the construction, continuation, and alteration, of public roads, are under the entire control of the State Legislatures, the direction and facilities of the mail, and whole post office police, must be subject to their control. But, if this Government has the right to carry its mails on private roads also, then every private man, who has the control and direction of these private ways, will, as well as the State Legislatures, have the consequent direction of the public mail.

The public roads of the States are subject to the jurisdiction of the State Legislatures, by whom the superintendence and police of the roads are usually confided to county tribunals of police. If one or more individuals desire the construction of a new road, the opposite parties, whose interests are affected, are summoned to show cause against the establishment of the proposed road, and if no sufficient objection can be shown, the road may be established. But the respective parties often compromise their differences, before any decision is made by the road tribunals, whereby it is contracted, that a certain person, or all the persons in a certain neighborhood, or vicinity, may have a road through the lands of others, on condition that the parties to be benefited shall refrain from insisting on the establishment of a public road. These amicable arrangements have been so usually resorted to in some sections of the country, as to supersede, in a measure, the establishment of public roads; yet, the proprietor of land, who becomes bound by such local contracts, is under no obligation to open his grounds for the passage of any, except the person, or vicinity, with which he has contracted. I have travelled three-fourths of a day in Maryland, on a direct course, in which my whole route passed through fields and gates, which the proprietors made no objection to passing, although they might have objected to the passage of every one who were not within the purview of the contract in pursuance of which the gates had been erected.

I now beg leave to propound a simple question: Can the United States force the passage of its mails through the private ways and gates that I have mentioned? If you answer in the negative, it hence follows, that the most eligible, and, indeed, necessary mail routes may be defeated, or impeded, not only by each State, but by combinations of neighbors, and sometimes by a single individual, in any State. But if you answer in the affirmative, by declaring that the United States may force a passage for her mail through these gates, then the whole question of the power of Congress is yielded to us; for the Government may force or break the locked gates, to effect the passage; and seeing that such force is the same sort of power which is declaimed against, with regard to the improvement or construction of roads, it must follow that this Government must stop and surrender its authority on the encounter of every such gate, or exert the same powers which are sufficient for the construction or repair of post roads. I know that my colleagues will not yield to this Government a mere provisional jurisdiction to open roads, when the States shall have omitted or refused to do so; for they declare that no act, consent, or conduct, of the State Government, can confer any power on the General Government, of which it is destitute. But, should they yield this point to the General Government, upon it would devolve the power of deciding whether the roads of the States were ample and convenient for the mails, and the power to determine and control this question would comprehend every umpirage over public roads that the friends of these resolutions contended for.

Several of my honorable colleagues, addressing you in the name of Virginia, have strongly protested against infringement on State sovereignties. In this, my colleagues pursue the bent and spirit of our native State, which has always occupied the front, in guarding against the encroachments of the Federal Government. But, if my colleagues, in continually assuming Virginia as the heroine or prepositus, in every instance of illustration, have only indulged in an excusable resort to homestead pride, knowing their liberality, I can readily foresee their readiness to yield, that I may consider myself, for a while, the advocate of our State. They have exhibited our State in every attitude of hostility to, or at least defence against, the force of the General Government; and I now ask, that I may be considered as Virginia for the moment in which I shall continue to occupy the floor. I would then remind you, in behalf of my native State, that she has surrendered to you the great and efficient sources of revenue, with powers that impose on the General Government correlative duties, or obligations of equal extent. Among other important delegations of power, is included the legislative authority on the subjects of the post offices and post roads. On this delegation of authority, you have (without any question of jurisdiction) built a department and superstructure that yields a revenue of considerable amount. This revenue is your property, and cannot be encroached on by the States; but the States, in surrendering to you the Post Office Department, although conferring with it all its incidental powers, did not mean, in regard to your relations with them, to create a mere source of revenue in your favor. The Post Office Establishment has become a considerable source of revenue to you; you extend its ramifications to a great area. I therefore require you to support it with your own revenue, and apprise you, that it is unreasonable and unjust, that you should, while deriving so great a revenue from that establishment in Virginia, require that State, without any participation of profit, to incur the labor and expense of working roads, on which you are to derive and collect this great revenue. In behalf of the citizens and landholders, I appeal to the fifth article of the amendments of the Constitution of the United States, which provides, "that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation."

I confide, that gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate, have proved, to the satisfaction of a majority of the House, that this Government has the power to construct military roads. This power, however, is denied by our opponents; and an honorable colleague (Mr. A. SMYTH) insists that the power to make military roads arises out of the emergencies of war, and ceases with the necessity, which justifies its exercise in a state of warfare. But in war, military roads are useful and necessary only for the passage of troops, provisions and military munitions; and, as the United States employ an army in times of peace, it is necessary to have military roads to effect the same objects at all times. My colleague (Mr. A. SMYTH) has been candid enough to admit that the United States may subscribe its money in the stock of companies incorporated for purposes of internal improvement, and the consequence which will necessarily follow from another principle he has recognised, will, I think, compel him to join our side of the question. He admits that the power to establish military roads exists in this Government; but insists that it is a military power, which belongs to the President of the United States as commander-in-chief of our army, (that is, to the Executive department,) and not to Congress. Permit me now to call his attention to the last clause of the eighth section of the Constitution of the United States, by which Congress not only has the power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to carry into execution its ordinary powers, but all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof. If the Congress has authority to make laws to carry into execution the powers vested in any department or officer of this Government, it must follow that, if the Executive department has the right to construct military roads, Congress may make laws to carry its power into execution; and this is all that the resolutions before us contend for. I cannot omit a review of one ground assumed by my honorable colleague, (Mr. BARBOUR,) which, according to method, ought to have been sooner noticed. He states that the Legislature of Virginia, in conferring jurisdiction on the county courts to open and alter public roads, has always paid a proper respect to the obligations imposed by the Constitution of the United States, by provisions that the courts should not have the power of discontinuing post roads. The State authorities then possessing the power to open a new road from one place to another, but no power to discontinue the old road, which is a post road, the old road which must be kept in repair by expenditures, must be worked by the State or by the United States; if, by the United States, the question is yielded to us, that this Government may employ labor on roads. But, if it be said that the State is bound to work and repair the old road, of no use but as a mail route, it would not only follow that the State subjects itself to an expense and labor to support the revenues of the United States, but, that the right to have these repairs made by the State, existing in this Government, it must, of consequence, possess the correspondent remedy to compel the States to furnish these repairs; and I may safely submit to my colleague, whether he would prefer to suffer, nay, require the United States to work her own post roads, or consent that Virginia should become the humble subaltern of the orders of this Government, and receive its mandates to work the post roads.

Although I cannot agree with my honorable colleague (Mr. TUCKER) that the assent of the States is essential to the exercise of our power to construct roads, I deem such assent as material whenever the expediency of exercising the power shall come in question; and I shall indeed vote for the proposition of my colleague, that we have the power with the assent of the States; for, if we have the power without the assent of the States, we surely have it when they assent.

On first reading the able and ingenious report of the select committee, I withheld my assent to the distinction it advances as to the different rules of interpretation which ought to pervade dissimilar provisions of the Constitution; as, that onerous powers of the Government ought to be strictly construed, whilst beneficial powers should admit of a more liberal interpretation. But, by more mature reflection, I am convinced, that whatever, in a compact, is for the equal and common advantage of all the parties, may justly be interpreted more liberally than more odious clauses, which impose burdens and hardships on one of the parties. And conceiving that national improvements tend to the benefit of all, I yield my assent to those who liberally expound our great charter; and instead of detaining the Committee with self-made arguments on this topic, I must beg leave to refer them to the second book of Vattel, chapter seventeenth, the authority of which will surely be admitted by gentlemen who are determined to view our Constitution as an international treaty.

I will no longer detain the Committee, but by way of conclusion must enter my protest against the scheme of interpreting the Constitution by what gentlemen are pleased to call an invocation of the principles of the revolution of 1798. This invocation is adverse to the just and liberal views which have hitherto characterized this Congress, and, without adverting to the merits or demerits of either of the old parties, it may be said that the annals of contending factions cannot be relied on as furnishing correct illustrations of political truths; and for myself at least, I must say, that in this, as in every other question, I choose to rely on my own judgment.

Mr. ORR, of Massachusetts, said, that, in rising on the present occasion, he was well aware of the danger of having imputed to him a great degree of insensibility, or a still greater degree of assurance—for, he had long since observed, that the patience of the Committee was exhausted. And he could assure the Committee, that he should not have entered into the debate at this late stage of it, had he felt convinced that no further argument, in opposition to the resolutions on the table, could be urged; but, the subject was, in its nature, complex, and admitted of great diversity of illustration; and, notwithstanding it had been ably argued by the honorable gentlemen who had preceded him on the same side, he could not feel reconciled to giving a silent vote.

In all that has been urged in argument, in support of the power contended for, no gentleman, said Mr. O., has condescended to inform us, what are the nature and character of that power. It has been generally said to be a resulting power, an incidental power. But this is no definition that conveys any distinct idea of its nature, its political bearing on society, its rank in the register of State authorities. Then, sir, as this has not been done, I will venture to assign it a name and a rank; and I do, without hesitancy, pronounce it to be nothing short of a substantive attribute of supremacy, of high State prerogative—a power to turn rivers from the channels which nature has assigned to them, and to subvert the soil of the citizen, and convert it to public use, without his consent, express or implied. It is the same degree of power as that, which can take the life of an offender against public justice, confiscate his estate, subject him to attainder and corruption of blood. This being the nature of the power contended for by the advocates of the resolutions, by whatever mode of reasoning they may have arrived at the consciousness that Congress possess it, I will proceed, said Mr. O., to examine whether it is, in reality, to be found in the Constitution. But, before I examine that, I will avail myself of the sentiments expressed by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. PINDALL,) who has just sat down, that the best mode of understanding the force of terms, the weight of precepts and precedents, is to have recourse to contemporaneous expositions of the things to which they are applied; to this I fully assent—for terms may change with time, while particular subjects, to which they apply, admit of no change. And I go still farther, sir; we may go even behind contemporaneous exposition of precepts and precedents, as applicable to maxims of State government; and, on the present occasion, I feel it to be necessary, not only to refer to the character of our statesmen at the time of the formation of the Constitution—but the origin and progress of that political science which brought it into existence. I proceed, then, to the foundation of our political institutions: these were the ancient charters of our ancestors, first of Virginia, then of Plymouth, and others in succession; and it is well worthy of remark, that almost all the defined powers of Parliament were conveyed in these charters to the colonies, by the Crown, in right of prerogative. Parliament had no power, either over the emigrants or the soil, and the Crown exercised a power towards both, that could not be exercised towards soil or subject, within the Kingdom; but in addition to Parliamentary powers, even Crown prerogatives were conferred on the colonists; and, with these chartered privileges, they commenced in the New World the operations of Government, each within prescribed limits of jurisdiction. From these grants, there was originally scarce anything left for the Crown, and, I should say, nothing at all for Parliament. Allegiance was due and acknowledged, but all powers essential to the internal government of the people, were, by them, exercised by their respective grants of territory and jurisdiction; their power to make laws were ample; and they extended as well to all jurisdictions, liberties, privileges, immunities and franchises, as to soil and person. Here, then, sir, is the origin, of the power to make roads and canals; the power to create corporations; the power to govern within the colonial limits, and even to carry on war. It is not to conquest, to the revolution, these powers are assignable—they originated in grant, and were imbedded into system—they were in full operation, till usurpation embarrassed them, and then came the Revolution, and snatched from the Crown the brightest ornament in the colonial wreath. Allegiance and fidelity were no longer due. It matters not, that the charters were occasionally infringed, altered, and even cancelled. The maxims of government were the same—once adopted, they were always retained through every scene of adversity. In the Plymouth colony, which led the way in the North, and was similar in its government to all in its vicinity, their ordinances respecting the laying out of roads, and their proceedings under them, were among their early acts of power; and the principle then adopted, as a rule between the public and the individual whose lands might be taken, has never been essentially changed. It is unnecessary to proceed further to show the origin and exercise of the power. The other colonies, under various modifications, enjoyed the same essential rights by charter, and exercised the same powers in virtue of it. Well, sir, the declaration of our independence acknowledged all these organized bodies to be free, sovereign, and independent States. All the attributes of government were theirs, and they were sustained by a people accustomed to exercise them with all the ability incident to political experience, and continued so to be exercised till the adoption of the Constitution, under which you are now legislating. Well, sir, let me ask, if any of the framers of the Constitution could ever have imagined, educated, as they were, in the school of politics, that the power to divert rivers to artificial courses, to lay open the enclosures of individuals for roads, from one end of the State to the other, without their consent, express or implied, passed into the hands of Congress by implication? Is the power contended for inferior in degree to any that is expressly granted in the Constitution? And can one power of equal degree result from another? It has not been contended by the advocates of the resolutions, that any but the supreme arm of State can effect the purposes contemplated—indeed, it cannot be contended.

In looking into the specified powers granted to Congress, there appears to be great precision used, and even minuteness, that nothing substantive might be left to incident. It was not sufficient to give the power to declare war and leave the raising of armies to be inferred, but both powers are expressly given, and, yet how very intimate is the connexion! The great objects of the powers granted, were but few. The derangement of the internal police of the States was as much as possible guarded against, consistently with the attainment of revenue, the control of our relations abroad, and of physical force at home.

But, if it could be for a moment doubtful, whether the power contended for be incidentally given in the specified powers, it seems to me, that the ninth and tenth articles of the amendments of the Constitution might put the question at rest. And, I will take the liberty, Mr. Chairman, to read them, for, there is not a word of them but what is weighty. "The enumeration, in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny, or disparage others retained by the people." "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

Now, sir, permit me to inquire if these amendments were not well understood, in their import, by those who use them. "The enumeration of certain rights shall not impair others retained by the people." What are rights retained by the people? Their soil and their rivers, or they have no rights. The gifts of nature are theirs. The soil, secured to them by their charters, by the common law, by the constitutions and laws of the States, is theirs; and, Congress has no legitimate power to lay a hand upon it; it would be an act of usurpation. I take the liberty to use the word usurpation, for the honorable gentleman from Virginia, on my right, (Mr. NELSON,) of far greater experience than myself, has set me the example, and, indeed, in my opinion, it is the most apt word that can be selected. Again, sir, the powers not delegated are reserved to the States, or the people. What powers are here meant? State powers, certainly—powers perfectly familiar to those who adopted the language, but, more especially, to those who proposed this amendment; both these amendments were recommended in substance, as well as many others which were not adopted, by the State conventions. The meaning, therefore, cannot be doubtful. Thus, then, the rights and powers relating to the subjects, embraced in the resolutions on your table, belong, expressly and exclusively, to the States and the people.

If, yet, however, there remains a doubt, I will proceed still further, in my endeavors to remove it. I trust it will not be contended, by any of the honorable gentlemen opposed to me, that, if the framers of the Constitution, upon a proposition to insert any specific additional power, rejected that proposition, still, that power might be inferred. I speak, now, of sovereign power, as great as that which is contemplated by the resolutions under discussion. If I am right, in this supposition, I persuade myself, that the Committee may be brought to pause, before they adopt the resolutions. For, at the time of the making of the Constitution, a distinct proposition was made, to give Congress the power to make canals, and the proposition was rejected. In the written arguments, between Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Hamilton, on the bank question, in 1791, it was contended, by the former, then Secretary of State, that the power to incorporate the bank was unconstitutional, and stated the rejected proposition to be broader than was admitted by his opponent, but the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Hamilton, admitted, that a proposition to give Congress power to make canals had been rejected. And, yet, by construction, we are to derive a power, not only not granted, but expressly withheld, in the amendments of the Constitution, which I have before spoken of, and which, from extraneous evidence of facts which transpired in the body that framed our Constitution, it is most apparent, was never intended to be given. Sir, it is singular, that a lapse of thirty years should have made it to appear, that the men, in whose wisdom the nation put great confidence, were really ignorant of what they had done, and that powers then clearly and expressly withheld are not as clearly conferred by the Constitution, by implication. "Words are things," said the famous Mirabeau, and, whenever that is the case, I shall conclude that words have ceased to be the true signs of things.

But, in order to obviate all difficulties, you propose to exercise the power with the consent of the respective States, and that they shall have jurisdiction over the property taken for public use. By the word "State" in the resolutions, is meant the State Legislatures. Now, it seems never to have entered into the inquiry of any of the honorable gentlemen opposed to me, whether or not the State Legislatures have the power ascribed to them. This is taken for granted, and it is certainly the easiest way of proceeding with the argument. But, I am induced to call on the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. PINDALL) to show me the constitution of any one of the States in the Union, which, upon any fair construction, enables its legislature to transfer any of the appropriate functions of the State authorities to Congress. And, if any one such constitution could be produced, I should call for one after another, till the whole twenty were found to contain the requisite provisions, for, if one should be deficient, your whole plan is partial and impracticable. If, however, the gentlemen still prefer to assume for the State Legislatures, this power, as being contained in their constitutions, I will venture upon the task of controverting the facts thus assumed. The constitution of a single State is sufficient. I will select that of Connecticut. And what is that constitution? The charter of Charles the Second. Now, sir, this charter contains no provision whatever that would authorize the Legislature of that State to negotiate the functions of the constituted authorities of that State to the Congress of the United States. And, it is equally vain to look into any other State constitution that has come within my notice for any such power, express or implied. But, it has been contended, by the honorable Speaker, that the consent of the State is not necessary to the exercise of the power, and other gentlemen have advanced the same doctrine, while, yet, other honorable gentlemen, on the same side, insist on the necessity of State consent. If, indeed, the consent contemplated is not essential to the power, it would seem hardly necessary to be passing legislative compliments with the States, on the subject; and, I apprehend, such a course is not merely harmless. For, as was observed on a former day, by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, on my left (Mr. SMYTH) with great truth, you hold up your purse to the State Legislatures, as a temptation. And, what is the Legislature to do, in such a case? They must either violate the trust reposed in them by their constituents, or take your assumed construction of their constitution, and accept your bonus.

Sir, before engaging in this kind of legislation, they should tear up their constitutions, and give them to the winds, and your decrees should be their rule of action. But suppose, Mr. Chairman, that some of the Legislatures, by the high authority of a decision of Congress to guide them—the bonus being also set before them—should determine that by their constitutions they really have the legislative and conventional powers ascribed to them, and should actually pass such a law as is contemplated; the members of such a Legislature, it is to be recollected, are not the beings of a day; and the people, dissatisfied with their past conduct, might return others in their place, and these repeal the law of the former—what would then be your answer to the second, the repealing law? It would be this: that the first law was a contract, and that the second, repealing it, would impair the obligation of that contract, and would be void by the Constitution. Thus, by the act of a single Legislature, elected for a year, you determine the destinies of the citizens and State governments on this subject forever. It has been strongly contended by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, before me, that legislative precedents ought to have weight; and, in the sense in which he has explained the subject, I do not dissent from the doctrine. Precedents that infringe no right may well be a rule of legislative economy; but precedents against the exercise of power are very insignificant; precedents against power are vanity—a mere gossamer. No regard is generally had to such precedents. But, what are precedents in favor of power—assumed power? These are the bolts—the rivets of chains—and are difficult to be broken by the arm of legitimate authority. When they yield, it is commonly to the strong power of insurrection.

But, with regard to precedents applicable to the present subject, none have been adduced which seem to me to be appropriate. The laws establishing the banks have been referred to, but they have no analogy to the present case; and if they had, there has been no consistency of decisions on the subject. The decisions are both ways, and therefore go for nothing, even if legislative precedent could be for a moment admitted to determine the construction of the Constitution. With regard to the bank, it is unnecessary to admit or deny its constitutionality, in discussing the present subject. I observe that some of the State Legislatures propose taxing the stock. In the practical operation of the bank, there is no doubt it is injurious to State institutions of the same kind, as its branches are extended through the States of the Union. Similar State institutions in Massachusetts have yielded a revenue of fifteen thousand dollars, from a tax laid on their capital stock, which has been applied to the support of her literary institutions, while the Branch Bank of the United States is free from such a tax. I will not digress further from the subject, but return for a moment to the subject of precedents; not because I consider it intrinsically important, but because it has been urged upon the consideration of the Committee with great zeal and ardor. The Cumberland road has been adduced, and for aught appears, the law respecting it passed without a moment's consideration upon the constitutionality of the measure; and if so, it is entitled to no weight whatever. The purchase of Louisiana is in no point analogous. The express powers of making war and peace render the acquisition of lands, without the limits of the States, subject to the rules of war and of the treaty-making power. The design of war is conquest, and an enemy is to be followed into his own dominions, if practicable and necessary, and his territory is acquired by force, by the laws of war, which Congress have an express power to declare. The war ceases in virtue of the treaty-making power, and it is in virtue of this also that the conquered or other lands may be ceded for the benefit of the people. There is another kind of precedent alluded to, as well in the report as by gentlemen in argument, the expenditure of money for charities, public buildings, books, ornaments. It is not certain that the trustees of the public money have always applied it to the best possible purposes. But there is a sensible difference between applying it to improvident or useless purposes, and employing it to assume power and subvert right. The difference is easy of illustration. If I employ a factor to dispose of my chattels, and vest the proceeds in stocks, it is merely a breach of trust, if he apply the money in schemes of his own devising; but, if he employ the money to subvert my soil, and divert my water-courses, this is a violation of my rights. Yet, both of us might agree to this intermeddling with the soil and the streams, when there was an outstanding title in the estate, a mortgage, or other beneficial interest; and if the proprietor of that interest should neither be consulted nor regarded, his rights would be violated. And this, sir, is precisely the case before the Committee. The people would have no rights, but in Congress and the State Legislatures, according to the doctrine contended for, and still the Constitution determines it to be otherwise.

Sir, there is no agreement among the advocates of the resolutions on your table. Some find the power contended for in almost all parts of the Constitution; some find it absolute, others incidental; to provide for the common defence and general welfare, gives it; to make and carry on war, gives it; to regulate commerce, and to establish post offices and post roads, give it. The honorable Speaker has contended, that the power to establish post offices and post roads, is the power to make them. But I cannot accede to this doctrine. I cannot, consistently with the dignity of this body, condescend, Mr. Chairman, to quibble about the word establish. I will attempt a fair explanation of it: The subjects to which it may, with propriety, be applied, must determine its import. Its most common and appropriate application is, to particular modes, accidents, or qualities, of things existing. But it can seldom, if ever, with propriety, be applied to the formation of things, by mechanical or other manual labor. You would not ask an artificer to establish you a ship, a coach, a suit of clothes. Neither, when a law is passed or made by Congress, can it be said, with any propriety of language, that the law is established. But, if a point in dispute, arising out of that law, should be decided in a court of justice, the law upon that point would be established. There have also been adduced, from the Constitution itself, instances of the use of this word, to show it to be synonymous with make or construct. The first instance that occurs, is in the preamble, where it is declared, that the Constitution is formed, among other things, to "establish justice." It must be obvious, at first thought, that justice is of higher origin and greater antiquity, than the Constitution; and, when courts of justice are said to be established, the meaning is, that a quality is conferred on men, to try causes, and establish points of law. The plain meaning of this clause of the Constitution, according to my understanding of it, is, that certain towns and villages shall be designated in parts of the country where civilized society resides, and such society shall be accommodated with a conveyance by the public agents for their letters and newspapers. They are entitled to this beneficence no longer than their roads will admit of it.

As to the power to regulate commerce, I cannot perceive how the power contended for results from that, especially as there would be no limit to your results; for public markets, corporations with particular privileges, and commercial wants, with an infinity of other resulting powers, would necessarily follow in succession. The first would be usurpation, and then another, and another. At the first, therefore, I should say, stand off. I will suppose, however, that your road was actually made and furnished with all its agents, superintendents, surveyors. The State is to have jurisdiction over it; they shall punish felonies and misdemeanors committed upon it. But what is to be done if the State suffers obstructions to be erected upon your road, and neglect to interpose their authority? You will then send a platoon, I suppose, to supply the place of authority. Again, what character is your road to have? Is it not to be the highway of the United States, and a proper subject of negotiation as to its use, in exchange for an equivalent? To facilitate commerce in peace, and approaches in war, your road is made from Maine to Canada, it may be supposed, altogether commodious for passing between New Brunswick and Canada. Will you grant the use of it, by treaty, for British troops, passing between the two colonies, in exchange for some advantage of commerce to the West Indies? Then, should the standard of revolt be raised in the Canadas, your road, and its borders, would be turned into a theatre of warfare, and that in direct violation of Constitutional rights. In time of war, let the laws of war govern; in peace, prepare for it by Constitutional means only. It is sufficient to resort to the law of necessity when all others are insufficient. The close of the long series of calamities which have passed in succession before us, seems not to require any unusual, any untried schemes of aggrandizement of power. In pursuit of these objects, we have seen the Old World in constant convulsions for more than twenty years. The passions of men were there moulded to a ferocity exceeding the fiercest tenant of the forest. Human sacrifice, by human hands, was the ordinary work of the day—it was brought into system. Justice and humanity ceased to be the signs of merit. Ambition swallowed up all subordinate sensations of the heart, and the air was constantly rent with shouts and acclamations of victorious war, while the earth groaned with the miseries of the fallen. In fine, sir, the genius of destruction, the destroying angel, was commissioned and let loose upon the world; and, from the burning deserts of the South, to the frozen regions of Siberia; from the Indies to the western limit of the Old World, all felt the vengeance of his arm, the blast of his wings. But the Old World was too narrow for the fulfillment of his commission. We have seen him on the ocean, a witness to scenes of conflict, when our own approached an enemy's ship, close and terrible, but in no measure doubtful. We have seen him on our Atlantic shores; in the North; in the West. And here, sir, in our own dominions, his dread commission was closed—and it may be said, without imputation of ostentation, that he imprinted the word "victory" on our national banner, and retired from the world. All was instantly a calm. We look back on the mighty spectacle without the power to grasp it, even by the efforts of imagination. We are confounded by the awful grandeur of realities in history, which have been witnessed in our own days. No period since the existence of the world is to be named with it, and none can be imagined as probable in future ages. In the calm of the present moment, we are called upon to legislate, as if another similar period were at hand. Sir, I repeat, I would always be prepared for war, but prepared according to the dictates of sound discretion, in apportioning the means to the occasion. But especially would I avoid even the appearance of encroachment on vested rights, when the imperious law of necessity makes no demand of it.

I do not consider, Mr. Chairman, that the stipulation in your resolutions to give an equivalent for the property you may take, in the exercise of the power contemplated, is of the smallest importance. There can be no equivalent for rights seized upon. The laws of the respective States have established the mode, the process by which the individual may be divested of the use of his property for the public benefit, and, by the constitutions and laws of some of the States, there are some kinds of privileged property which cannot be taken in the ordinary administration of such constitutions and laws. The right, to be heard in the courts established to adjudicate on this subject, is a vested right in every individual.

I have hardly thought it necessary to advert to arguments founded on a supposed analogy, between expending money for building light-houses, purchasing a library, paintings, and making charitable or honorary gifts to the proposed objects of expenditure in the resolutions. Sir, there is no exercise of power in all this, that may not be exercised by an individual. He may build a house and ornament it, or he may place it on a promontory and light it up in the night for the benefit of the merchant and mariner; but there is really nothing of analogy, that I can perceive, in the nature of the case.

Mr. Chairman, I will touch but one subject more, and that briefly. The measure in contemplation, if carried into effect, must pervade the whole system of State and municipal authorities, and impair the vested rights of innumerable corporations, who have virtually the faith of their States pledged not to admit so powerful a competition as the Congress of the United States to the exercise of the functions of those institutions. The honorable Speaker has seen fit to introduce the letter of the "Father of his Country" to the President of Congress, stating, among other things, that the Convention had kept in view "the consolidation of our Union." Sir, the consolidation of our Union is essentially different from a consolidation of the States and their definite powers—the one is the cement of your marble, the other the chemical process that dissolves it to a rude unformed mass. I agree with the honorable Speaker, that we are one family, and that the good of all is to be consulted. But, sir, it is never to be forgotten, that we are a family by affinity, and inhabit distinct apartments of the political edifice. You hold the upper loft of the same edifice. I would be cautious of enlarging the avenues to these different apartments now harmoniously governed by their occupants; but, especially, I would not remove the partitions, for in this operation even the pillars must be swept away, and your superstructure fall into ruins. From these ruins would be moulded, by the hand of faction, a stupendous despotism, splendid in armor, but terrific in aspect, gigantic in power, relentless in the exercise of it; every voice that should be heard in support of our expiring liberties would be silenced; every arm that should be raised in their defence would be paralyzed—smitten off.

I would, therefore, not venture hastily on experiments which tend to blend or confuse the power of our political institutions; but, with a scrupulous care, would leave no means untried to protect all, and hand down to posterity that great body of National and State rights and privileges, which we have derived from the wisdom, the valor, and the blood of our fathers.

Mr. CLAY said, that he had been anxious to catch the eye of the Chairman for a few moments, to reply to some of the observations which had fallen from various gentlemen. He was aware that, in doing this, he risked the loss of what was of the utmost value—the kind favor of the House, wearied as its patience was by this prolonged debate. But, when he felt what a deep interest the Union at large, and particularly that quarter of it whence he came, had in the decision of the present question, he could not omit an opportunity of earnestly urging upon the House the propriety of retaining the important power which that question involved. It will be recollected, said Mr. C., that, if unfortunately there should be a majority both against the abstract proposition asserting that power, and against its practical execution, the power is gone forever—the question is put to rest so long as the Constitution remains as it is, and with respect to any amendment, in this particular, he confessed he utterly despaired. It would be borne in mind, that the bill which passed Congress on this subject at the last session, had been rejected by the late President of the United States; that, at the commencement of the present session, the President had communicated his clear opinion, after every effort to come to a different conclusion, that Congress did not possess the power contended for, and had called upon us to take up the subject in the shape of an amendment to the Constitution; and, moreover, that the predecessor of the present and late President had also intimated his opinion that Congress did not possess the power. With the great weight and authority of the opinions of these distinguished men against the power, and with the fact, solemnly entered upon the record, that this House, after a deliberate review of the ground taken by it at the last session, had decided against the existence of it, (if such fatally should be the decision,) the power, he repeated, was gone, gone forever, unless restored by an amendment to the Constitution. With regard to the practicability of obtaining such an amendment, he thought it altogether out of the question. Two different descriptions of persons, entertaining sentiments directly opposed, would unite and defeat such an amendment; one embracing those who believed that the Constitution, fairly interpreted, already conveys the power, and the other, those who think that Congress have not, and ought not to have it. As a large portion of Congress, and probably a majority, believed the power already to exist, it must be evident, if he were right in supposing that any considerable number of that majority would vote against an amendment which they did not believe necessary, that any attempt to amend would fail. Considering, as he did, the existence of the power as of the first importance, not merely to the preservation of the Union of the States, paramount as that consideration ever should be over all others, but to the prosperity of every great interest of the country, agriculture, manufactures, commerce, in peace and in war, it becomes us, said Mr. C., solemnly, and deliberately, and anxiously, to examine the Constitution, and not to surrender it, if fairly to be collected from a just interpretation of that instrument.

With regard to the alarm sought to be created, as to the nature of the power, by bringing up the old theme of "State rights," he would observe, that if the illustrious persons just referred to were against us in the construction of the Constitution, they were on our side, as to the harmless and beneficial character of the power. For it was not to be conceived that each of them would have recommended an amendment to the Constitution, if they believed that the possession of such a power by the General Government would be detrimental, much less dangerous to the independence and liberties of the States. What real ground was there for this alarm? Gentlemen had not condescended to show how the subversion of the rights of the States was to follow from the exercise of the power of internal improvements by the General Government. We contend for the power to make roads and canals to distribute the intelligence, force, and productions of the country through all its parts; and for such jurisdiction only over them as is necessary to their preservation from wanton injury, and from gradual decay. Suppose such a power is maintained, and in full operation; imagine it to extend to every canal made or proposed to be made, and to every post road, how inconsiderable and insignificant is the power, in a political point of view, limited as it is with regard to place and to purpose, when contrasted with the great mass of powers retained by the State sovereignties! What a small subtraction from that mass! Even upon those roads and canals the State governments, according to our principles, would still exercise jurisdiction over every possible case arising upon them, whether of crime or of contract, or any other human transaction, except only what immediately affected their existence and preservation. Thus defined, thus limited, and stripped of all factitious causes of alarm, Mr. C. would appeal to the dispassionate candor of gentlemen to say, if the power really presented anything frightful in it? With respect to post roads, our adversaries admit the right of way in the General Government.

H. OF R.

There had been, however, on this question some instances of conflict, which had passed away without any serious difficulty. Connecticut, if he had been rightly informed, had disputed, at one period, the right of passage of the mail on the Sabbath. The General Government persisted in the exercise of the right, and Connecticut herself, and everybody else, acquiesced in it.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. H. NELSON) has contended, Mr. C. continued, that I do not adhere, in the principles of construction which I apply to the Constitution, to the republican doctrines of 1798, of which that gentleman would have us believe he is the constant disciple. Let me call the attention of the Committee to the celebrated State paper to which we both refer for our principles in this respect—a paper which, although I had not seen it for sixteen years until the gentleman had the politeness to furnish me with it during this debate, made such an impression upon my mind, that I shall never forget the satisfaction with which I first perused it. I find that I had used, without having been aware of it, when I formerly addressed the Committee, almost the identical language employed by Mr. Madison in that paper. It will be recollected that I claimed no right to exercise any power under the Constitution, unless such power was expressly granted, or necessary and proper to carry into effect some granted power. I have not sought to derive the power from the clause which authorizes Congress to appropriate money. I have been contented with endeavoring to show, that according to the doctrines of 1798, that according to the most rigid interpretation which any one will put upon the instrument, it is expressly given in one case, and fairly deducible in others. [Here Mr. C. read sundry passages from Mr. Madison's report to the Virginia Legislature of an answer to the resolutions of several States, concerning the alien and sedition laws, showing that there were no powers in the General Government but what were granted, and that, whenever a power was claimed to be exercised by it, such power must be shown to be granted, or to be necessary and proper to carry into effect one of the specified powers.] It would be remarked, Mr. C. said, that Mr. Madison, in his reasoning on the Constitution, had not employed the language fashionable during this debate; he had not said that an implied power must be absolutely necessary to carry into effect the specified power, to which it is appurtenant, to enable the General Government to exercise it. No! Mr. C. said, this was a modern interpretation of the Constitution. Mr. Madison had employed the language of the instrument itself, and had only contended that the implied power must be necessary and proper to carry into effect the specified power. He had only contended that when Congress applied its sound judgment to the Constitution, in relation to implied powers, it should be clearly seen that they were necessary and proper to effectuate the specified powers. These, said Mr. C., are my principles; but they are not those of the gentleman from Virginia and his friends on this occasion.

They contend for a degree of necessity absolute and indispensable, that by no possibility could the power be otherwise executed.

That there are two classes of powers in the Constitution, Mr. C. believed never to have been controverted by any American politician. We cannot foresee and provide specifically for all contingencies. Man and his language are both imperfect. Hence, the existence of construction, and of constructive powers. Hence, also, the rule that a grant of the end is a grant of the means. If you amend the Constitution a thousand times, the same imperfection of our nature and our language will attend your new works. There are two dangers to which we are exposed. The one is, that the General Government may relapse into the debility which existed in the old Confederation, and finally dissolve from the want of cohesion. The denial to it of powers plainly conferred, or clearly necessary and proper to execute the conferred powers, may produce this effect. And, I think, with great deference to the gentlemen on the other side, this is the danger to which their principles directly tend. The other danger is, that of consolidation by the assumption of powers not granted nor incident to granted powers—the assumption of powers which have been withheld or expressly prohibited. This was the danger of the period of 1798–9. For instance, in that direct contradiction to a prohibitory clause of the Constitution, a sedition act was passed; and an alien law was also passed, in equal violation of the spirit, if not of the express provisions of the Constitution. It was by such measures that the Federal party, (if parties might be named,) throwing off the veil, furnished to their adversaries the most effectual ground of opposition. If they had not passed those acts, he thought it highly probable that the current of power would have continued to flow in the same channel; and the change of parties in 1801, so auspicious to the best interests of this country, as he believed, would never have occurred.

Mr. C. begged the Committee—he entreated the true friends of the confederated Union of these States—to examine this doctrine of State rights, and see to what abusive, if not dangerous, consequences it may lead, to what extent it had been carried, and how it had varied by the same State at different times. In alluding to the State of Massachusetts, he assured the gentlemen from that State, and particularly the honorable chairman of the committee to whom the claim of Massachusetts had been referred, that he had no intention to create any prejudice against that claim. He hoped that, when the subject was taken up, it would be candidly and dispassionately considered, and that a decision would be made on it consistent with the rights of the Union and of the State of Massachusetts. The high character, amiable disposition, and urbanity of the gentleman (Mr. MASON, of Massachusetts) to whom he had alluded, would, if he had been otherwise inclined, prevent him from endeavoring to make impressions unfavorable to the claim whose justice that gentleman stands pledged to manifest. But, in the period of 1798-9, what was the doctrine promulgated by Massachusetts? It was, that the States, in their sovereign capacities, had no right to examine into the Constitutionality or expediency of the measures of the General Government. [Mr. C. here quoted several passages from the answer of the State of Massachusetts to the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions concerning the alien and sedition laws, to prove his position.] We see here an express disclaimer, on the part of Massachusetts, of any right to decide on the Constitutionality or expediency of the acts of the General Government. But what was the doctrine which the same State, in 1813, thought proper to proclaim to the world, and that too when the Union was menaced on all sides? She not only claimed, but exercised, the right which, in 1799, she had so solemnly disavowed. She claimed the right to judge of the propriety of the call made, by the General Government, for her militia, and she refused the militia called for. There was so much plausibility in the reasoning employed by that State in support of her modern doctrine of "State rights," that, were it not for the unpopularity of the stand she took in the late war, or had it been in other times and under other circumstances, she would very probably have escaped a great portion of that odium which has most justly fallen on her lot. The Constitution gives to Congress power to provide for calling out the militia to execute the laws of the Union, to suppress insurrections and to repel invasions, and in no other cases. The militia is called out by the General Government, during the late war, to repel invasion. Massachusetts said, as you have no right to the militia but in certain contingencies, she was competent to decide whether those contingencies had or had not occurred. And, having examined the fact, what then? She said all was peace and quietness in Massachusetts, no non-execution of the laws, no insurrection at home, no invasion from abroad, nor any immediate danger of invasion. And, in truth, Mr. C. said, he believed there was no actual invasion for nearly two years after the requisition. Under these circumstances, had it not been for the supposed motive of her conduct, he asked if the case which Massachusetts made out would not be extremely plausible?

Mr. C. said he hoped it was not necessary for him to say that it was very far from his intention to convey anything like approbation of the conduct of Massachusetts. No! his doctrine was, that the States, as States, have no right to oppose the execution of the powers which the General Government asserts. Any State has undoubtedly the right to express its opinion, in the form of resolution or otherwise, and to proceed, by Constitutional means, to redress any real or even imaginary grievance; but it has no right to withhold its military aid, when called upon by the high authorities of the General Government, much less to obstruct the execution of a law regularly passed. To suppose the existence of such an alarming right, is to suppose, if not dis-union itself, such a state of disorder and confusion as must inevitably lead to it.

Mr. C. said, that, greatly as he venerated the State which gave him birth, and much as he respected the judges of its supreme court, several of whom were his personal friends, he was obliged to think that some of the doctrines which that State had recently held concerning State rights, were fraught with much danger. Had those doctrines been asserted during the late war, and related to the means of carrying on that war, a large share of the public disapprobation which has been given to Massachusetts, might have fallen on Virginia. What were these doctrines? The courts of Virginia have asserted that they have a right to determine on the Constitutionality of any law or treaty of the United States, and to expound them according to their own views, even if they should vary from the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. They have asserted more—that from their decision there could be no appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and that there exists in Congress no power to frame a law, obliging the court of the State, in the last resort, to submit its decision to the supervision of the Supreme Court of the United States; or, if he did not misunderstand the doctrine, to withdraw from the State tribunals controversies involving the laws of the United States, and to place them before the Federal Judiciary. I am a friend, said Mr. C., a true friend to State rights; but not in all cases as they are asserted. The States have their appointed orbit; so has the Union; and each should be confined within its fair, legitimate, and Constitutional sphere. We should equally avoid that subtle process of argument which dissipates into air the powers of this Government, and that spirit of encroachment which would snatch from the States powers not delegated to the General Government. We shall thus escape both the dangers I have noticed—that of relapsing into the alarming weakness of the Confederation, which was described as a mere rope of sand, and also that other, perhaps not the greatest danger, consolidation. No man deprecates more than I do, the idea of consolidation; yet, between separation and consolidation, painful as would be the alternative, he should greatly prefer the latter.

Mr. C. would now proceed to endeavor to discover the real difference, in the interpretation of the Constitution, between the gentlemen on the other side and himself. It was agreed that there was no power in the General Government but that which is expressly granted, or which is impleable from an express grant. The difference, then, must be in the application of this rule. The gentleman from Virginia, who has favored the House with so able an argument on the subject, had conceded, though somewhat reluctantly, the existence of incidental powers; but he contended that they must have a direct and necessary relation to some specified power. Granted. But who is to judge of this relation? And what rule can you prescribe different from that which the Constitution has required, that it should be necessary and proper? Whatever may be the rule, in whatever language you may choose to express it, there must be a certain degree of discretion left to the agent who is to apply it. But gentlemen are alarmed at this discretion, that law of tyrants, on which they contend there is no limitation. It should be observed, in the first place, that the gentlemen are necessarily brought, by the very course of reasoning which they themselves employ, by all the rules which they would lay down for the Constitution; to cases where discretion must exist. But is there no limitation, no security against the abuse of it? Yes, there is such security in the fact of our being members of the same society, equally affected ourselves by the laws we promulgate. There is the further security in the oath which is taken to support the Constitution, and which will tend to restrain Congress from deriving powers which are not proper and necessary. There is the yet further security, that at the end of every two years the members must be amenable to the people for the manner in which their trust has been performed. And there remains also that further though awful security, the last resort of society, which he contended belonged alike to the people and the States in their sovereign capacity, to be exercised in extreme cases, and when oppression becomes intolerable, the right of resistance. Take the gentleman's own doctrine, (Mr. BARBOUR,) the most restricted which had been asserted, and what other securities have we against the abuse of power than those which I have enumerated? Say that there must be an absolute necessity to justify the exercise of an implied power, who is to define that absolute necessity, and then to apply it? Who is to be the judge? Where is the security against transcending that limit? The rule the gentleman contends for has no greater security than that insisted upon by us. It equally leads to the same discretion—a sound discretion, exercised under all the responsibility of a solemn oath; of a regard to our fair fame; of a knowledge that we are ourselves the subjects of those laws which we pass; and, lastly, of the right of resisting insupportable tyranny. And by way of illustration, Mr. C. said, that if the sedition act had not been condemned by the indignant voice of the community, the right of resistance would have accrued. If Congress assumed the power to control the right of speech, and to assail by penal statutes that greatest of all the bulwarks of liberty, the freedom of the press, and there were no other means to arrest their progress, but that to which he had referred, lamentable as would be the appeal, such a monstrous abuse of power, he contended, would authorize a recurrence to that right.

If, then, the gentlemen on the other side and himself differed so little in their general principles, as he thought he had shown, he would proceed for a few moments to look at the Constitution a little more in detail. I have contended, said Mr. C., that the power to construct post roads is expressly granted in the power to establish post roads. If it be, there is an end to the controversy; but if not, the next inquiry is, whether that power may be fairly deduced by implication from any of the specified grants of power. To show that the power is expressly granted, I might safely appeal to the arguments already used to prove that the word establish, in this case, can mean only one thing—the right of making. Several gentlemen had contended that the word had a different sense; and one had resorted to the preamble of the Constitution to show that the phrase "to establish justice," there used, did not convey the power of creation. If the word "establish" was there to be taken in the sense which gentlemen claimed for it, that of adoption or designation, Congress could have had a choice only of systems of justice pre-existing. Would any gentleman contend that they were obliged to take the Justinian code, the Napoleon code, the code of civil, or the code of common or canon law? Establishment means in the preamble, as in other cases, construction, formation, creation.

Let me ask, in all cases of crime, which are merely malum prohibitum, if you do not resort to construction, to creating, when you make the offence? By your laws denouncing certain acts as criminal offences, laws which the good of society require you to pass, and to adapt to our peculiar condition, you do construct and create a system of rules, to be administered by the judiciary. But gentlemen say that the word cannot mean make; that you would not say, for example, to establish a ship, to establish a chair. In the application of this, as of all other terms, you must be guided by the nature of the subject; and if it cannot properly be used in all cases, it does not follow that it cannot be in any. And when we take into consideration, that, under the old Articles of Confederation, Congress had over the subject of post roads just as much power as gentlemen allow to the existing Government, that it was the general scope and spirit of the new Constitution to enlarge the powers of the General Government, and that, in fact, in this very clause, the power to establish post roads is superadded to the power to establish post offices, which was alone possessed by the former Government, he thought that he might safely consider the argument on this part of the subject as successfully maintained. With respect to military roads, the concession that they may be made when called for by the emergency, is admitting that the Constitution conveys the power. And we may safely appeal to the judgment of the candid and enlightened, to decide between the wisdom of those two constructions, of which one requires you to wait, for the exercise of your power, until the arrival of an emergency, which may not allow you to exert it; and the other, without denying you the power, if you can exercise it during the emergency, claims the right of providing beforehand against the emergency.

One member had stated what appeared to him a conclusive argument against the power to cut canals, that he had understood that a proposition made in the Convention, to insert such a power, was rejected. To this argument more than one sufficient answer could be made. In the first place, the fact itself had been denied, and he had never yet seen any evidence of it. But, suppose that the proposition had been made and overruled, unless the motives of the refusal to insert it were known, gentlemen were not authorized to draw the inference, that it was from hostility to the power, or from a desire to withhold it from Congress. Might not one of the objections be, that the power was fairly to be inferred from some of the specific grants of power, and that it was therefore not necessary to insert the proposition; that to adopt it, indeed, might lead to weaken or bring into doubt other incidental powers not enumerated? A member from New York, (Mr. STORRS,) whose absence Mr. C. regretted on this occasion, not only on account of the great aid which might have been expected from him, but, from the cause of that absence, had informed him that, in the convention of that State, one of the objections to the Constitution by the anti-Federalists was, that it was understood to convey to the General Government, the power to cut canals. How often, in the course of the proceedings of this House, do we reject amendments, upon the sole ground that they are not necessary, the principle of the amendment being already contained in the proposition?

Mr. C. referred to the Federalist, for one moment, to show that the only notice taken of that clause of the Constitution which relates to post roads, was favorable to his construction. The power, that book said, must always be a harmless one. He had endeavored to show not only that it was perfectly harmless, but that every exercise of it must be necessarily beneficial. Nothing which tends to facilitate intercourse among the States, says the Federalist, can be unworthy of the public care. What intercourse? Even if restricted on the narrowest theory of gentlemen, on the other side, to the intercourse of intelligence, they deny that to us, since they will not admit that we have the power to repair or improve the way, the right of which they yield us. In a more liberal and enlarged sense of the word, it will comprehend all those various means of accomplishing the object, which are calculated to render us a homogeneous people—one in feeling, in interest, and affection, as we are one in our political relation.

Was there not a direct and intimate relation between the power to make war and military roads and canals? It was in vain that the Convention should have confided to the General Government the tremendous power of declaring war; should have imposed upon it the duty to employ the whole physical means of the nation, to render the war, whatever may be its character, successful and glorious, if the power is withheld of transporting and distributing those means. Let us appeal to facts which are sometimes worth volumes of theory. We have recently had a war raging on all the four quarters of the Union. The only circumstance which gave me pain at the close of that war, the detention of Moose Island, would not have occurred, if we had possessed military roads. Why did not the Union—why did not Massachusetts make a struggle to reconquer the island? Not for the want of men; not for the want of patriotism, he hoped, but from the want of the physical ability to march a force sufficient to dislodge the enemy. On the Northwestern frontier, millions of money, and some of the most precious blood of the State from which I have the honor to come, were wastefully expended for the want of such roads. My honorable friend from Ohio, (Mr. HARRISON,) who commanded the army in that quarter, could furnish a volume of evidence on this subject. What now paralyzes our armies on the Southern frontier, and occasioned the recent massacre of fifty of our brave soldiers? What but the want of proper means for the communication of intelligence, and for the transportation of our resources from point to point?

Whether we refer to our own experience, or to that of other countries, we cannot fail to perceive the great value of military roads. Those great masters of the world, the Romans, how did they sustain their power so many centuries, diffusing law and liberty, and intelligence all around them? They made permanent military roads; and among the objects of interest which Europe now presents, are the remains of those Roman roads, which are shown to the curious inquirer. If there were no other monument remaining of the sagacity, and of the illustrious deeds of the unfortunate captive of St. Helena, the internal improvements which he made, the road from Hamburg to Basle, would perpetuate his memory to future ages. In making these allusions, let me not be misunderstood. I do not desire to see military roads established for the purpose of conquest, but of defence; and as a part of that preparation which should be made in a season of peace for a season of war. I do not wish to see this country ever in that complete state of preparation for war for which some contend, that is, that we should constantly have a large standing army, well disciplined, and always ready to act. I want to see the bill reported by my friend from Ohio, or some other embracing an effective militia system, passed into a law; and a chain of roads and canals, by the aid of which our physical means can be promptly transported to any required point. These, connected with a small military establishment to keep up our forts and garrisons, constitute the kind of preparation for war, which, it appeared to him, this country ought to make. No man, who has paid the least attention to the operations of modern war, can have failed to remark how essential good roads and canals are to the success of those operations. How often have battles been won by celerity and rapidity of movement? It was one of the most essential circumstances in war. But, without good roads it was impossible! He recalled to the recollection of some of the members the fact that, in the Senate, several years ago, an honorable friend of his, (Mr. BAYARD,) whose premature death he ever deplored—who was an ornament to the councils of his country, and whom, when abroad, he found the able and fearless advocate of her rights, had, in supporting a subscription which he proposed the United States should make to the stock of the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal Company, earnestly recommended the measure as connected with our operations in war. I listened to my friend with some incredulity, and thought he pushed his argument too far. I had, soon after, a practical evidence of its justness. For, in travelling from Philadelphia, in the Fall of 1813, I saw transporting by Government, from Elk river to the Delaware, large quantities of massy timbers for the construction of the Guerriere or the Franklin, or both; and judging from the number of wagons and horses, and the number of days employed, I believe the additional expense of that single operation, would have gone very far to complete that canal, whose cause was espoused with so much eloquence in the Senate, and with so much effect, too, bills having passed that body more than once to give aid, in some shape or other, to that canal. With notorious facts like this, was it not obvious that a line of military canals was not only necessary and proper, but almost indispensable to the war-making power?

One of the rules of construction, Mr. C. continued, which had been laid down, he acknowledged his incapacity to comprehend. Gentlemen say that the power in question is a substantive power; and that no substantive power could be derived by implication. What is their definition of a substantive power? Will they favor us with the principle of discrimination between powers which being substantive are not grantable but by express grant, and those which, not being substantive, may be conveyed by implication? Although he did not perceive why this power was more entitled than many implied powers to the denomination of substantive, suppose that he yielded, how did gentlemen prove that it may not be conveyed by implication? If the positions were maintained, which have not yet been proven, that the power is substantive, and that no substantive power can be implied, yet he trusted it had been satisfactorily shown that there was an express grant.

His honorable friend from Virginia (Mr. NELSON) had denied the operation of Executive influence on his mind; and had informed the Committee that from that quarter he had nothing to expect, to hope, or to fear. I did not impute to my honorable friend any such motive. I know his independence of character and of mind too well to do so. But, I entreat him to reflect, if he does not expose himself to such an imputation by those less friendly disposed towards him than myself. Let us look a little at facts. The President recommended the establishment of a bank. If ever there were a stretch of the implied powers conveyed by the Constitution, it has been thought the grant of the charter of the National Bank was one. But the President recommends it. Where was then my honorable friend, the friend of State rights, who so pathetically calls upon us to repent, in sack-cloth and ashes, our meditated violation of the Constitution; and who kindly expresses his hope that we shall be made to feel the public indignation? Where was he at this awful epoch? Where was that eloquent tongue which we have now heard with so much pleasure? Silent! Silent as the grave!

[Mr. NELSON said, across the House, that he had voted against the bank bill when first recommended.]

Alas! said Mr. C., my honorable friend had not the heart to withstand a second recommendation from the President; but, when it came, yielded, no doubt, most reluctantly to the Executive wishes, and voted for the bank! At the last session of Congress, Mr. Madison recommends (and I will presently make some remarks on that subject) an exercise of all the existing powers of the General Government to establish a comprehensive system of internal improvements. Where was my honorable friend on that occasion? Not silent as the grave, but he gave a negative vote almost as silent. No effort was made on his part, great as he is when he exerts the powers of his well stored mind to save the Commonwealth from that greatest of all calamities, a system of internal improvement. No, although a war with all the allies, he now thinks, would be less terrible than the adoption of this report, not one word then dropped from his lips against the measure. [Mr. NELSON said he voted against the bill.] That he whispered out an unwilling negative, Mr. C. did not deny, but it was unsustained by that torrent of eloquence which was poured out on the present occasion. But, said Mr. C., we have an Executive Message now, not quite as ambiguous in its terms, nor as oracular in its meaning, as that of Mr. Madison appears to have been. No; the President now says, that he has made great efforts to vanquish his objections to the power, and that he cannot but believe that it does not exist. Then my honorable friend rouses, thunders forth the danger in which the Constitution is, and sounds the tocsin of alarm. Far from insinuating that he is at all biased by the Executive wishes, I appeal to his candor to say, if there is not a remarkable coincidence between his zeal and exertions, and the opinions of the Chief Magistrate?

Now let us review these opinions as communicated at different points. It was the opinion of Mr. Jefferson, that, although there was no general power vested by the Constitution in Congress to construct roads and canals, without the consent of the States, yet such a power might be exercised with their assent. Mr. Jefferson not only held this opinion in the abstract, but he practically executed it in the instance of the Cumberland road, and how? First, by a compact made with the State of Ohio, for the application of a specified fund, and then by compacts with Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, to apply the fund so set apart within their respective limits. If, however, I rightly understood my honorable friend the other day, he expressly denied (and in that, concur with him) that the power could be acquired by the mere consent of the State. Yet he defended the act of Mr. Jefferson in the case referred to. [Mr. NELSON expressed his dissent to this statement of his argument.] Mr. C. said it was far from his intention to misstate the gentleman. He certainly had understood him to say, that, as the road was first stipulated for in the compact with Ohio, it was competent afterwards to carry it through the States mentioned, with their assent. Now, if we have not the right to make a road in virtue of one compact made with a single State, can we obtain it by two contracts made with several States? The character of the fund could not affect the question. It was totally immaterial whether it arose from the sales of the public lands or from the general revenue. Suppose a contract made with Massachusetts, that a certain portion of the revenue collected at the port of Boston, from foreign trade, should be expended in making roads and canals leading to that State, and that a subsequent compact should be made with Connecticut or New Hampshire, for the expenditure of the fund on these objects, within their limits; can we acquire the power, in this manner, over internal improvements, if we do not possess it independently of such compacts? He conceived clearly not. And he was entirely at a loss to comprehend how gentlemen, consistently with their own principles, could justify the erection of the Cumberland road. No man, he said, was prouder than he was of that noble monument of the provident care of the nation, and of the public spirit of its projectors; and he trusted, that, in spite of all Constitutional and other scruples here or elsewhere, an appropriation would be made to complete that road. He confessed, however, freely, that he was entirely unable to conceive of any principle on which that road could be supported that would not uphold the general power contended for.

He would now examine the opinion of Mr. Madison. Of all the acts of that pure, virtuous, and illustrious statesman, whose Administration has so powerfully tended to advance the glory, honor, and prosperity of this country, he most regretted, for his sake and for the sake of the country, the rejection of the bill of the last session. He thought it irreconcilable with Mr. Madison's own principles—those great broad and liberal principles on which he so ably administered the Government. And, sir, said Mr. C., when I appeal to the members of the last Congress, who are now in my hearing, I am authorized to say, with regard to the majority of them, that no circumstance, not even an earthquake that should have swallowed up one half of this city, could have excited more surprise than when it was first communicated to this House, that Mr. Madison had rejected his own bill—I say his own bill—for his Message at the opening of the session meant nothing, if it did not recommend such an exercise of power as was contained in that bill. My friend who is near me, (Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia) the operations of whose vigorous and independent mind depend upon his own internal perceptions, has expressed himself with a becoming manliness, and thrown aside the authority of names as having no bearing with him on the question. But their authority has been referred to, and will have influence with others. It was impossible, moreover, to disguise the fact, that the question is now a question between the Executive on the one side and the Representatives of the people on the other. So it is understood in the country, and such is the fact. Mr. Madison enjoys, in his retreat at Montpelier, the repose and the honors due to his eminent and laborious public services; and I would be among the last to disturb it. However painful it is to me to animadvert upon any of his opinions, I feel perfectly sure that the circumstance can only be viewed by him with an enlightened liberality. What are the opinions which have been expressed by Mr. Madison on this subject? I will not refer to all the Messages wherein he has recommended internal improvements, but to that alone which he addressed to Congress at the commencement of the last session, which contains this passage: "I particularly invite again the attention of Congress to the expediency of exercising their existing powers, and, where necessary, of resorting to the prescribed mode of enlarging them, in order to effectuate a comprehensive system of roads and canals, such as will have the effect of drawing more closely together every part of our country, by promoting intercourse and improvements, and by increasing the share of every part in the common stock of national prosperity." In the examination of this passage, two positions forced themselves upon our attention. The first was the assertion, that there are existing powers in Congress to effectuate a comprehensive system of roads and canals, the effect of which would be to draw the different parts of the country more closely together. And I would candidly admit, in the second place, that it was intimated, that, in the exercise of those existing powers, some defect might be discovered which would render an amendment of the Constitution necessary. Nothing could be more clearly affirmed than the first position; but in the Message of Mr. Madison returning the bill, passed in consequence of his recommendation, he has not specified a solitary case to which those existing powers are applicable; he has not told us what he meant by those existing powers; and the general scope of his reasoning in that Message, if well founded, proved that there were no existing powers whatever. It was apparent that Mr. Madison himself had not examined some of those principal sources of the Constitution, from which, during this debate, the power had been derived. I deeply regret, and I know that Mr. Madison regretted, that the circumstances under which the bill was presented to him (the last day but one of a most busy session) deprived him of an opportunity of that thorough investigation of which no man is more capable. It is certain that, taking his two Messages at the same session together, they are perfectly irreconcilable. What, moreover, was the nature of that bill? It did not apply the money to any specific object of internal improvement, nor designate any particular mode in which it should be applied, but merely set apart and pledged the fund to the general purpose, subject to the future disposition of Congress. If, then, there were any supposable case whatever to which Congress might apply money in the erection of a road, or cutting a canal, the bill did not violate the Constitution. And it ought not to have been anticipated that money constitutionally appropriated by one Congress would afterwards be unconstitutionally expended by another.

I come now, said Mr. C., to the Message of Mr. Monroe; and if, by the communication of his opinion to Congress, he intended to prevent discussion, he has most woefully failed. I know that, according to a most venerable and excellent usage, the opinion neither of the President nor of the Senate, upon any proposition depending in this House, ought to be adverted to. Even in the Parliament of Great Britain, a member who would refer to the opinion of the Sovereign, in such a case, would be instantly called to order; but, under the extraordinary circumstances of the President having, with I have no doubt the best motives, volunteered his opinion on this head, and inverted the order of legislation, by beginning where it should end, I am compelled, most reluctantly, to refer to that opinion. I cannot but deprecate the practice of which the President has, in this instance, set the example to his successors. The Constitutional order of legislation supposes that every bill originating in one House shall be there deliberately investigated, without influence from any other branch of the Legislature, and then remitted to the other House for a like free and unbiassed consideration. Having passed both Houses, it is to be laid before the President—signed if approved, and if disapproved to be returned, with his objections, to the originating House. In this manner, entire freedom of thought and of action is secured, and the President finally sees the proposition in the most matured form which Congress can give to it. The practical effect, to say no more, of forestalling the legislative opinion, and telling us what we may or may not do, will be to deprive the President himself of the opportunity of considering a proposition so matured, and us of the benefit of his reasoning, applied specifically to such proposition; for the Constitution further enjoins it upon him to state his objections upon returning the bill. The originating House is then to reconsider it, and deliberately to weigh those objections; and it is further required, when the question is again taken, Shall the bill pass, those objections notwithstanding? that the votes shall be solemnly spread by yeas and nays upon the record. Of this opportunity of recording our opinions on matters of great public concern we are deprived, if we submit to the innovation of the President. I will not press this part of the subject further. I repeat, again and again, that I have no doubt but that the President was actuated by the purest motives. I am compelled, however, in the exercise of that freedom of opinion which so long as I exist I will maintain, to say that the proceeding is irregular and unconstitutional. Let us, however, examine the reasoning and opinion of the President. [Mr. C. here quoted the passage of the Message at the opening of the session, which follows:]

"A difference of opinion has existed, from the first formation of our Constitution to the present time, among our most enlightened and virtuous citizens, respecting the right of Congress to establish such a system of improvement. Taking into view the trust with which I am now honored, it would be improper, after what has passed, that this discussion should be revived, with an uncertainty of my opinion respecting the right. Disregarding early impressions, I have bestowed on the subject all the deliberation which its great importance and a just sense of my duty required; and the result is, a settled conviction on my mind that Congress do not possess the right. It is not contained in any of the specified powers granted to Congress; nor can I consider it incidental to, or a necessary mean, viewed on the most liberal scale, for carrying into effect any of the powers which are specifically granted. In communicating this result, I cannot resist the obligation which I feel to suggest to Congress the propriety of recommending to the States the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution, which shall give to Congress the right in question. In cases of doubtful construction, especially of such vital interest, it comports with the nature and origin of our institutions, and will contribute much to preserve them, to apply to our constituents for an explicit grant of the power. We may confidently rely, that, if it appears to their satisfaction that the power is necessary, it will always be granted."

In this passage the President has furnished us with no reasoning, no argument in support of his opinion—nothing addressed to the understanding. He gives, indeed, an historical account of the operations of his own mind, and he asserts that he has made a laborious effort to conquer his early impressions, but that the result is a settled conviction against the power, without a single reason. In his position, that the power must be specifically granted or incident to a power so granted, it has been seen that I have the honor to entirely concur with him; but, he says the power is not among the specified powers. Has he taken into consideration the clause respecting post roads, and told us how and why that does not convey the power? If he had acted within what I conceive to be his Constitutional sphere of rejecting the bill, after it had passed both Houses, he must have learned that great stress was placed on that clause, and we should have been enlightened by his comments upon it. As to his denial of the power, as an incident to any of the express grants, Mr. C. said, he would have thought that we might have safely appealed to the experience of the President, during the late war, when the country derived so much benefit from his judicious administration of the duties of the War Department, whether roads and canals for military purposes were not essential to celerity and successful result in the operations of armies. This part of the Message was all assertion, and contained no argument which he could comprehend, or which met the points contended for during this debate. Allow me here, said Mr. C. to say, and do it without the least disrespect to that branch of the Government, on whose opinions and acts it has been rendered my painful duty to comment—let me say, in reference to any man, however elevated his station, even if he be endowed with the power and prerogatives of a sovereign, that his acts are worth infinitely more, and are more intelligible than mere paper sentiments or declarations. And what have been the acts of the President? During his tour of last Summer, did he not order a road to be cut or repaired from near Plattsburg to the St. Lawrence? And my honorable friend will excuse me if my comprehension is too dull to perceive the force of that argument which seeks to draw a distinction between repairing an old and making a new road. [Mr. NELSON said he had not drawn that distinction, having only stated the fact.] Certainly no such distinction was to be found in the Constitution or existed in reason. Grant, however, the power of reparation and we will make it do. We will take the post roads, sinuous as they are, and put them in a condition to enable the mails to pass, without those mortifying and painful delays and disappointments to which we, at least in the West, are so often liable. The President, then, ordered a road of considerable extent to be constructed or repaired, on his sole authority, in a time of profound peace, when no enemy threatened the country, and when, in relation to the power as to which alone that road could be useful in time of war, there existed the best understanding, and a prospect of lasting friendship greater than at any former period. On his sole authority the President acted, and we are already called upon by the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to sanction the act by an appropriation. This measure has been taken, too, without the consent of the State of New York; and what is wonderful, when we consider the magnitude of the State rights which are said to be violated, without even a protest on the part of that State against it. On the contrary, I understand, from some of the military officers who are charged with the execution of the work, what is very extraordinary, that the people, through whose quarter of the country the road passes, do not view it as a national calamity; that they would be very glad that the President would visit them often, and that he would order a road to be cut and improved, at the national expense, every time he should visit them. Other roads, in other parts of the Union, have, it seems, been likewise ordered, or their execution, at the public expense, sanctioned, by the Executive, without the concurrence of Congress. If the President has the power to cause these public improvements to be executed, at his pleasure, whence is it derived? If any member will stand up in his place and say the President is clothed with this authority, and that it is denied to Congress, let us hear from him; and let him point to the clause of the Constitution which vests it in the Executive and withhold it from the Legislative branch.

There is no such clause; there is no such exclusive Executive power. The power is derivable by the Executive only from those provisions of the Constitution which charge him with the duties of commanding the physical force of the country, and the employment of that force in war and in the preservation of the public tranquillity, and in the execution of the laws. But Congress has paramount power to the President. It alone can declare war, can raise armies, can provide for calling out the militia in the specified instances, and can raise and appropriate the ways and means necessary to these objects. Or is it come to this, that there are to be two rules of construction for the Constitution—one, and an enlarged rule, for the Executive—and another, and a restricted rule, for the Legislature? Is it already to be held, that, according to the genius and nature of our institutions, powers of this kind may be safely intrusted to the Executive, but, when attempted to be exercised by the Legislature, are so alarming and dangerous that a war with all the allied Powers would be less terrible, and that the nation should clothe itself straightway in sackcloth and ashes? No, sir, if the power belongs only by implication to the Chief Magistrate, it is placed both by implication and express grant in the hands of Congress. I am so far from condemning the act of the President, to which I have referred, that I think it deserving of high approbation; that it was within the scope of his Constitutional authority I have no doubt; and I sincerely trust that the Secretary of War will, in time of peace, constantly employ in that way the military force. It will, at the same time, guard that force against the vices incident to indolence and inaction, and correct the evil of subtracting from the mass of the labor of society, where labor is more valuable than in any other country, that portion of it which enters into the composition of the Army. But I most solemnly protest against any exercise of powers of this kind, by the President, which are denied to Congress. And, if the opinions expressed by him, in his Message, were communicated or are to be used here to influence the judgment of the House, their authority is more than counterbalanced by the authority of his deliberate acts.

Some principles drawn from political economists have been alluded to, and we are advised to leave things to themselves, upon the ground, that, when the condition of society is ripe for internal improvements, that is, when capital can be so invested with a fair prospect of adequate remuneration, they will be executed by associations of individuals, unaided by Government. With my friend from South Carolina (Mr. LOWMEYER) I concur in this as a general maxim; and I also concur with him that there are exceptions to it. The foreign policy which I think this country ought to adopt, presents one of those exceptions. It would perhaps be better for mankind, if, in the intercourse between nations, all would leave skill and industry to their unstimulated exertions. But this is not done; and if other Powers will incite the industry of their subjects and depress that of our citizens, in instances where they may come into competition, we must imitate their selfish example. Hence the necessity to protect our manufactures. In regard to internal improvements, it did not always follow that they would be constructed whenever they would afford a competent dividend upon the capital invested. It may be true generally that, in old countries, where there is a great accumulation of surplus capital, and a consequent low rate of interest, that they would be made. But in a new country the condition of society may be ripe for public works long before there is, in the hands of individuals, the necessary accumulation of capital to effect them; and, besides, there is generally, in such a country, not only a scarcity of capital, but such a multiplicity of profitable objects presenting themselves as to distract the judgment. Further; the aggregate benefit resulting to the whole society, from a public improvement may be such as to amply justify the investment of capital in its execution, and yet that benefit may be so distributed among different and distant persons as that they can never be got to act in concert. The turnpike roads wanted to pass the Alleghany mountains, and the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal, are objects of this description. Those who would be most benefited by these improvements reside at a considerable distance from the sites of them; many of those persons never have seen and never will see them. How is it possible to regulate the contributions, or to present to individuals so situated a sufficiently lively picture of their real interests to get them to make exertions, in effectuating the object, commensurate with their respective abilities? I think it very possible that the capitalist, who should invest his money, in one of those objects, might not be reimbursed three per cent. annually upon it. And yet society, in various forms, might actually reap fifteen or twenty per cent. The benefit resulting from a turnpike road, made by private associations, is divided between the capitalist who receives his tolls, the lands through which it passes, and which are augmented in their value, and the commodities whose value is enhanced by the diminished expense of transportation. A combination upon any terms, much less a just combination, of all these interests to effect the improvement is impracticable. And if you await the arrival of the period when the tolls alone can produce a competent dividend, it is evident that you will have to suspend its execution until long after the general interests of society would have authorized it.

Again, improvements made by private associations are generally made by the local capital. But ages must elapse before there will be concentrated in certain places, where the interests of the whole community may call for improvements, sufficient capital to make them. The place of the improvement too is not always the most interested in its accomplishment. Other parts of the Union—the whole line of the seaboard—are quite as much if not more interested in the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal, as the small tract of country through which it is proposed to pass. The same observation will apply to turnpike roads passing the Alleghany mountains. Sometimes the interest of the place of the improvement is adverse to the improvement and to the general interest. He would cite Louisville, at the rapids of the Ohio, as an example, whose interest will probably be more promoted by the continuance, than the removal of the obstruction. Of all the modes in which a Government can employ its surplus revenue, none is more permanently beneficial than that of internal improvement. Fixed to the soil, it becomes a durable part of the land itself, diffusing comfort and activity, and animation on all sides. The first direct effect was on the agricultural community, into whose pockets came the difference in the expense of transportation between good and bad ways. Thus, if the price of transporting a barrel of flour by the erection of the Cumberland turnpike should be lessened two dollars, the producer of the article would receive that two dollars more now than formerly.

But, putting aside all pecuniary considerations, there may be political motives sufficiently powerful alone to justify certain internal improvements. Does not our country present such? How are they to be effected if things are left to themselves? I will not press the subject further. I am but too sensible how much I have abused the patience of the Committee by trespassing so long upon its attention. The magnitude of the question, and the deep interest I feel in its rightful decision, must be my apology. We are now making the last effort to establish our power; and I call on the friends of Congress, of this House, or the true friends of State rights (not charging others with intending to oppose them) to rally around the Constitution, and to support, by their votes, on this occasion, the legitimate powers of the Legislature. If we do nothing this session but pass an abstract resolution on the subject, I shall, under all circumstances, consider it a triumph for the best interests of the country, of which posterity will, if we do not, reap the benefit. I trust that, by the decision which shall be given, we shall assert, uphold, and maintain, the authority of Congress, notwithstanding all that has been, or may be, said against it.

Mr. NELSON spoke a short time in reply to Mr. CLAY.

Mr. CLAY again rose. It was certainly very far from his intention, he said, to prefer any charge against the gentleman of undue submission to Executive influence; though the gentleman certainly had, with great zeal, if not ability, defended the conduct of the Executive in the cases of the employment of the military force in the construction of roads, and of that part of the message respecting the power of Congress to make roads and canals. But the honorable gentleman, said Mr. C., has made some personal allusions to myself. I have been on a foreign embassy, he says. If I have, sir, that office was unsolicited, and was accepted under an imperious sense of public duty. [Mr. NELSON said he did not mean to insinuate that that, or any other office, had been solicited by the Speaker, or was not due to his merit and public services.] Mr. C. resumed. The honorable gentleman has also thought proper to intimate that departments have been offered. It was not necessary for him to say whether there was any and what ground for this intimation; but he would say, that on this subject, not in this House, but elsewhere, motives had been ascribed to him, in relation to a particular office, as false as the imputation of them was malignant. I have desired no office from the Executive; I have preferred the honors conferred on me by my constituents, and by the kindness of this House, to any in the gift of any other branch of Government. With regard to the gentleman who fills the office of President, I have already said that I consider the office as an honorable reward due to him for his long and faithful services; for the simplicity, sincerity, and purity of his character, as displayed in the distinguished offices which he had previously filled. But, whatever may be my opinion of him or of others, I shall sacrifice no part of my public duty to a servile compliance with his views. I come here to serve my constituents and my country according to the Constitution, my conscience and my best comprehension of the public welfare. I am no grovelling sycophant, no mean parasite, no base suppliant at the foot of authority. I respect the co-ordinate branches of Government, but will exercise my own rights with the freedom which belongs to an American citizen, without fear of the consequences. The gentleman speaks of impeachment of the President, if he has exceeded his authority. Does the gentleman expect, by this sort of defiance, to influence this House or the people against the exertion of their Constitutional rights? The power of impeachment is one which, if ever exercised—and it may be doubted whether it ever will be in regard to the Chief Magistrate—can only be employed in cases of palpable breaches of the Constitution, with bad motive. But it does not follow, because the President is not, and will not be impeached for his conduct, that he may not have performed acts without the pale of his Constitutional authority. I admit, certainly, the power of recommendation to Congress of measures called for by the public good, which the Executive possesses; but I contend that it is a power of a very questionable nature, when attempted to be exercised in regard to constructions of the Constitution, and amendments to the instrument, in making which amendments the Constitution has given him no participation. The power of the President is not to recommend to Congress abstinence from action, but measures of a positive character. I do say, and I do think, and I care not who thinks otherwise, that in this particular instance it would have been better had the President refrained from expressing his opinion against a measure which had the approbation of Congress at the last session, which he must have supposed would be again renewed, whatever might be his opinion, and which, the gentleman's opinion notwithstanding, I believe nine-tenths of the people are in favor of. I repeat my thanks, said Mr. C. in conclusion, to the gentleman from Virginia, for the repetition of his wish that the people will put down us who support this measure. I will, for evil return to him good; and hope that the people will duly appreciate him and his exertions against the measure, and will permit him still to remain in this House, an ornament to the Legislature, and to the district he represents.

After Mr. CLAY's brief rejoinder, the Committee rose and reported their agreement to the resolution, with an amendment to strike out all of the said resolution after the word Resolved, and to insert, in lieu thereof, the following, to wit:

1. That Congress has power, under the Constitution, to appropriate money for the construction of post roads, military, and other roads, and of canals, and for the improvement of water-courses.

2. Resolved, That Congress has power, under the Constitution, to construct post roads, and military roads: Provided, That private property be not taken for the public use, without just compensation.

3. Resolved, That Congress has power, under the Constitution, to construct roads and canals, necessary for commerce between the States: Provided, That private property be not taken for public purposes, without just compensation.

4. Resolved, That Congress has power, under the Constitution, to construct canals for military purposes: Provided, That no private property be taken for any such purpose, without just compensation being made therefor.

Leave was given for the Committee of the Whole to sit again, on the residue of the order committed to them. And then the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, March 14.

Mr. HERBERT presented a petition of the Directors of the Eastern Branch Bridge Company, praying that permission may not be granted to build another bridge over the Eastern Branch, within the limits of the City of Washington.—Referred.

Mr. LOWNDES presented a petition of David Gelston, on behalf of himself and Peter A. Schenck, praying to be indemnified against a judgment recovered against them for the seizure of the ship American Eagle, for an alleged breach of the laws of the United States, under direction from the Secretary of the Treasury.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. FORNEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Adolphus Burghart, deceased; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of William Barton.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Richard Bland Lee, Commissioner of Claims, transmitting a report of the facts in the case of Nathan Ford, with the evidence accompanying it; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a report of the Secretary of War, on the petition of Brintnel Robbins; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a report of the Secretary of the Navy, on the petition of Frederick Ernest and Frederick Williamson; which report was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, viz: "An act respecting the transportation of persons of color, for sale, or to be held to labor;" and, "An act to extend the jurisdiction of the circuit court of the United States, to cases arising under the law relating to patents;" and a resolution "directing the distribution of the laws of the fourteenth Congress, among the members of the fifteenth Congress;" in which bills and resolutions they ask the concurrence of this House.

The first mentioned bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The last mentioned bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The resolution aforesaid was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, the Committee on Roads, Canals, and Seminaries of Learning, were instructed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating a reasonable sum, out of the proceeds of the public lands in the State of Mississippi, to the opening and improving the navigation of Pearl river, in said State, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT.

The House having resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole, on the report of a Committee on the subject of Roads and Canals; and the question being on agreeing to the first resolution reported by said committee, in the following words:

1. Resolved, That Congress has power, under the Constitution, to appropriate money for the construction of post roads, military, and other roads, and of canals, and for the improvement of water-courses.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said he had never voted for any proposition since he had enjoyed the honor of a seat in this House, which he did not believe to be sanctioned by the express letter of the Constitution; nor should he on the present occasion. After expressing the satisfaction which he had received from this debate, than which he had never listened to any with greater pleasure, Mr. J. proceeded to say, that, as he bottomed his opinion on this question on the express letter of the Constitution, he should derive no aid in support of his vote by implication. He claimed for Congress no grant of power under that clause of the Constitution which speaks of the common defence and general welfare; nor did he stand here in any other character than as an advocate for State rights; for he was thoroughly convinced that there never was a more vital attack on the integrity of the States, and on State rights, than would be the rejection of the present proposition, unless it were immediately followed by an amendment to the Constitution in this respect.

Mr. J. called the attention of the House to that part of the Constitution which gives to Congress the power to regulate commerce among the several States. On what principle, if this proposition were to be rejected, had Congress appropriated, for the purposes of trade with the Indian tribes three hundred thousand dollars of the public money? Under what part of the Constitution did Congress exercise the power of appropriating money for the purpose of erecting and maintaining light-houses, if not under that of regulating trade with foreign nations? For neither of these objects was there a grant of power in stronger terms, or more certainly imparted to Congress, than was the power to give security and facility to the trade between the several States; for which purpose the General Government had the same power over the soil of the several States, as it undeniably had over the water-courses. If to the States alone belonged the power of making roads and canals, he could not, he said, conceive of anything more calculated to weaken the power of the States, than to subject those roads and canals, when made by the States, to the control of the General Government, for the purpose of exercising its Constitutional power of regulating the intercourse between the States. Suppose, said he, that the State of Kentucky should make a canal round the falls of the Ohio, will Congress regulate the trade through this channel, or will it surrender to the State of Kentucky the power expressly granted to Congress? If Congress do not give up the power, we shall be tributary to the United States; we shall have opened a canal with our own resources, and Congress will have the power to regulate trade through it. As strange, therefore, as it might appear to some gentlemen who had argued in a very different manner, Mr. J. said, he contended that the rejection of this proposition had a tendency to weaken the authority of the States, and to make State rights subservient to the Congress of the United States. Again, said he, I ask any gentleman to point out in what possible way roads and canals can be used, but for the purposes pointed out in the Constitution. The object of opening a road or a canal is to facilitate intercourse among the States and among the people. But, it was said, that the exercise of such a power was not necessary in the sense of the term used in the Constitution. Is it necessary, he asked, to have national armories? Cannot we purchase arms by private contract? Is it necessary to have magazines? Can we not hire buildings for the purpose? But we build, and wisely build, magazines and armories, and appoint persons to labor in and superintend them. And was it more necessary and proper, he demanded, to have magazines, and national armories, than to have roads and canals to give facility to the transportation of the munitions of war? He should be glad to know, he said, on what principle of construction of the Constitution gentlemen would deny to Congress the power of opening roads and canals for the purpose of internal trade and commerce, and for the purpose of transporting munitions of war, unless, in the instance he had mentioned, there had been frequent and flagrant violations of the Constitution.

H. or R.

Internal Improvements.

In regard to the power in question, if to exercise it would be a violation of the Constitution, it has been violated in many cases already—in making a road from Georgia to New Orleans, from Nashville to Natchez, &c.—in making the great road from Cumberland to Ohio, and from Ohio to the line—in opening a road from Detroit to Fort Meigs, and from Fort Meigs to Lower Sandusky, with several others, which he mentioned. If these were violations of the Constitution, thus repeated, it depended upon gentlemen, if the Constitution was worth preservation, to show how this evil was to be corrected.

As to the arguments which had gone to the policy of this measure, he had never before heard the utility of internal improvements a subject of controversy. Had the policy of the different States, in opening roads and canals, been objected to? Had the policy of foreign nations in this respect been deemed unwise? Had the policy of Holland been questioned, where there was a continued chain of internal navigation? On the continent of Europe, had there ever been a difference of sentiment as to the value of the canals which intersect it; of the canal of Languedoc, or of that of the Seine and Loire, or of hundreds of others, which it were unnecessary to occupy the time of the House by enumerating? Had the policy of China ever been objected to, which had a canal navigation of eight hundred miles in extent, and which employed two thousand individuals for forty years in its construction from Peking to Canton; and canals even to water the farms, besides roads innumerable, which it would take him till doomsday to enumerate? Or that of England, who had opened an internal communication by means of canals, uniting the Irish Channel with the German Ocean, and pervading the country, which were to the people of England the source of much wealth, and of much convenience? We have seen nations and people differ as to the rights of conscience, as to the tenets of religion, and as to modes of government, from democracy to despotism, on almost every question arising out of the multiplicity and variety of human concerns; yet, go to England, Holland, France, China, Russia, you find canals and roads distributing around fertility and accommodation. Yet it would appear, from the discussion which had taken place, there was, in the Congress of the United States, a difference of opinion as to the policy of internal improvement! At this Mr. J. expressed great surprise. Bring your imagination, said he, to contemplate a union of the waters of the Illinois with the waters of Michigan; of the Miami with the Ohio; of the Alleghany with the waters of Lake Erie. Bring your mind to reflect on the immense advantages to be derived from a connexion between the waters of the Atlantic with the upper Lakes, by means of the Susquehanna, the Hudson, and the Delaware; between James river and Catawba; between the waters of Alabama and Tennessee; between those of the Chesapeake and Delaware. What is there alarming in the General Government having it in its power to accomplish these and similar objects? If I could see any evils possibly resulting from the exercise of such a power, far would it be from me to advocate it.

Mr. J. said he had not risen to make a speech on this subject; but, as it might not fall to his lot hereafter to have an opportunity of expressing his opinion on the subject of internal improvement, by means of roads and canals, he could not forbear to state to the House, as he had done, that, resting on the letter of the Constitution, not on its spirit; on the words of it, not on derivative construction; not in opposition to State rights, but in support of them, he was decidedly in favor of the report of the committee favorable to internal improvement, under the authority of the United States.

Mr. DESHA moved to amend the said resolution, by striking out the words "and other," the effect of which would have been to confine the declaration to post roads and military roads.

After some remarks from Mr. LOWNDES, who desired that the amendment might not prevail, that the House might be allowed to vote on the broad proposition, the motion of Mr. DESHA was negatived.

Mr. MILLS moved to postpone indefinitely the further consideration of the subject, and supported this motion in a speech of half an hour.

Mr. TUCKER spoke against the motion, and called upon gentlemen to unite against it, that the opportunity might not be lost of expressing the opinion of this House.

Mr. RHEA then delivered his sentiments on the general question.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, supported the motion for postponement by a number of remarks, the object of which was to show that a further prosecution of the discussion would be a consumption of valuable time, without any probability of arriving at a practical result.

Mr. LOWNDES replied to Mr. SMITH, by observations calculated to show that it was highly important to obtain a decision of this House at the present session; a different course, after the many days consumed in debate, he thought would be unjust to the committee who had made report on the subject, and dissatisfactory in its result.

Messrs. BALDWIN and LIVERMORE also opposed the indefinite postponement.

The motion for indefinite postponement was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays—for the postponement 77, against it 87, as follows:

So the first resolution was adopted.

The second resolution having been read in the following words:

2. Resolved, That Congress has power, under the Constitution, to construct post roads and military roads; provided that private property be not taken for public use, without just compensation.

Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, moved to amend the resolution by inserting, after the words "private property," the words "or the property of any State;" and adding to the end of the resolve a clause, that neither the property of the one nor the other be taken, without just compensation therefor.

This motion was grounded by Mr. HOLMES, and supported by Mr. RHEA, as presenting the question more broadly to the House, and was opposed by Mr. LOWNDES, as embracing a wider scope than he was willing to give to the resolution, and, in fact, introducing a new principle.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. DESHA moved to amend the resolution by inserting, after the words "military roads," the words "with the consent of the States."—Negatived.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the second resolution as above stated, and decided as follows—yeas 82, nays 84:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson of Kentucky, Baldwin, Barber of Ohio, Bateman, Bayley, Beecher, Bloomfield, Campbell, Colston, Comstock, Crawford, Cruger, Cushman, Darlington, Ellicott, Ervin of South Carolina, Forsyth, Gage, Hall of Delaware, Harrison, Hasbrouck, Hendricks, Herbert, Herkimer, Herrick, Heister, Hitchcock, Hopkinson, Irving of New York, Johnson of Kentucky, Jones, Kinsey, Lawyer, Linn, Livermore, Lowndes, McLane, Marchand, Marr, Mercer, Moore, Morton, Mumford, Murray, Ogden, Ogle, Palmer, Parrott, Patterson, Pawling, Peter, Pindall, Porter, Quarles, Rich, Robertson of Kentucky, Robertson of Louisiana, Savage, Schuyler, Sergeant, Seybert, Simkins, Slocumb, Ballard Smith, Southard, Speed, Spencer, Stuart of Maryland, Tallmadge, Tarr, Taylor, Terrill, Trimble, Upham, Wallace, Wendover, Westerlo, Whiteside, Wilkin, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Wilson of Pennsylvania.

ry, Tompkins, Townsend, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Walker of North Carolina, Whitman, Williams of Connecticut, Williams of New York, and Williams of North Carolina.

So the resolution was not agreed to.

Mr. STROTHER desired to record his vote in the negative on this question, having been accidentally out of the House when the question was put; but the standing rule forbade the leave.

The third resolution was then read, as follows:

"Resolved, That Congress has power, under the Constitution, to construct roads and canals necessary for commerce between the States; provided, that private property be not taken for public purposes, without just compensation."

Mr. HOLMES moved to amend the resolution, by adding thereto a clause, that no property shall be taken of any State, without making compensation therefor.—Negatived.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, then moved to amend the resolution, by inserting, after the word "States," the words, "with the consent of the States through which the same may pass."

This motion was negatived by yeas and nays—120 to 46, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adams, Ball, Barber of Ohio, Bateman, Cobb, Crawford, Culbreth, Desha, Harrison, Hasbrouck, Hendricks, Herrick, Hitchcock, Holmes of Massachusetts, Hubbard, Johnson of Kentucky, Jones, Linn, Livermore, Marchand, Marr, Moore, Murray, Jeremiah Nelson, T. The question then recurred on agreeing to the third resolution, and, being taken, was determined in the negative—yeas 71, nays 95, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson of Kentucky, Baldwin, Bateman, Bayley, Beecher, Bloomfield, Campbell, Colston, Comstock, Crawford, Cruger, Cushman, Darlington, Ellicott, Ervin of South Carolina, Forsyth, Gage, Hall of Delaware, Harrison, Hasbrouck, Herbert, Herkimer, Herrick, Heister, Hitchcock, Hopkinson, Hubbard, Irving of New York, Johnson of Kentucky, Jones, Kinsey, Lawyer, Livermore, Lowndes, McLane, Marchand, Moore, Morton, Mumford, Ogden, Ogle, Palmer, Parrott, Patterson, Pawling, Peter, Pindall, Porter, Quarles, Rich, Robertson of Ky., Robertson of Louisiana, Savage, Schuyler, Sergeant, Simkins, Bal. Smith, Speed, Stewart of North Carolina, Strong, Strother, Taylor, Terry, Tompkins, Townsend, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Walker of North Carolina, Walker of Kentucky, Whitman, Williams of Connecticut, and Williams of North Carolina.

The question was then stated upon concurring with the Committee of the Whole, in that part of their amendment embraced by the fourth resolution, in the following words, viz:

4. Resolved, That Congress has power, under the Constitution, to construct canals for military purposes: Provided, That no private property be taken for any such purpose, without just compensation being made therefor.

Mr. DESHA moved to amend the same, by inserting, after the word "purposes," the words "with the consent of the States through which they may pass."

And the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

The question then recurred on agreeing to the said fourth resolution, and, being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 81, nays 83, as follows:

So the resolution was not agreed to.

The result of the whole proceeding is, that the House have come to the following resolution:

"That Congress have power, under the Constitution, to appropriate money for the construction of post roads, military and other roads, and of canals, and for the improvement of water-courses."

Mr. POINDEXTER then submitted for consideration the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Congress have power, under the Constitution, to appropriate money in aid of the construction of roads and canals, which shall be laid out, and constructed, under the authority of the Legislature of the States through which they pass."

After some conversation—

The question being taken thereon, was decided in the negative.

Mr. LOWNDES then remarked, that, after the decision of this House to-day, there could be no doubt that a large majority of the House entertained the conviction of the power of Congress to appropriate money for the purpose of constructing roads and canals. The sense of the House being thus ascertained, and the obstruction removed to any proposition embracing that object; he moved that the further consideration of the report lie on the table.

The motion having been agreed to—

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported a bill making further appropriations for the Cumberland road; which was twice read and committed.

OUR RELATIONS WITH SPAIN.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate, of the 16th December, and of the House of Representatives, I lay before Congress, a report of the Secretary of State, and the papers referred to in it, respecting the negotiation with Spain. To explain fully the nature of the differences between the United States and Spain, and the conduct of the parties, it has been found necessary to go back to an early epoch. The recent correspondence, with the documents accompanying it, will give a full view of the whole subject, and place the conduct of the United States, in every stage, and under every circumstance, for justice, moderation, and a firm adherence to their rights, on that high and honorable ground, which it has invariably sustained.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, March 14, 1818.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 14, 1818.

The Secretary of State, to whom have been referred the resolution of the Senate, of 16th December, and of the House of Representatives of the 24th February last, has the honor of submitting to the President the correspondence between this Department and the Spanish Minister's residence here, since he received the last instructions of his Government to renew the negotiations which, at the time of the last communication to Congress, was suspended by the insufficiency of his powers. These documents will show the present state of the relations between the two Governments.

As in the remonstrance by Mr. de Onis, of the 6th of December against the occupation by the United States of Amelia Island, he refers to a previous communication from him, denouncing the expedition of Sir Gregor McGregor against that place, his note of 9th July, being the paper thus referred to, is added to the papers now transmitted. Its date, when compared with that of the occupation of Amelia by McGregor, will show that it was written ten days after that event; and the contents of his note of 6th December, will show that measures had been taken by the competent authorities of the United States to arrest McGregor as soon as the unlawfulness of his proceedings within our jurisdiction had been made known to them by legal evidence, although he was beyond the reach of the process before it could be served upon his person. The tardiness of Mr. Onis's remonstrance is of itself a decisive vindication of the magistrates of the United States against any imputation of neglect to enforce the laws; for, if the Spanish Minister himself had no evidence of the project of McGregor, sufficient to warrant him in addressing a note upon the subject to this Department, until ten days after it had been accomplished, it cannot be supposed that officers, whose authority to act commenced only at the moment of the actual violation of the laws, and who could be justified only by clear and explicit evidence of the facts in proof of such violation, should have been apprized of the necessity of their interposition in time to make it effectual before the person accused had departed from this country.

As, in the recent discussions between Mr. Onis and this Department, there is frequent reference to those of the negotiation at Aranjuez in 1805, the correspondence between the Extraordinary Minister of the United States at that period, and Don Pedro Cevallos, then the Minister of Foreign Affairs in Spain, will be also submitted as soon as may be, to be laid before Congress, together with the correspondence between Don Francisco Pizarro and Mr. Erving, immediately preceding the transmission of new instructions to Mr. Onis and other correspondence of Mr. Onis with this Department, tending to complete the view of the relations between the two countries.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The Message and accompanying documents was referred to the committee on so much of the President's Message "as relates to the subject of Foreign Affairs."

MONDAY, March 16.

Mr. NARR presented a petition of the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, praying that such measures may be adopted, as will enable of citizens of that State to take possession of lands purchased by them from the State of North Carolina, and which are now held by the Chickasaw Indians, under a treaty concluded with the United States.—Referred to the committee appointed on the 17th December last, respecting the Indian title to lands within the State of Kentucky.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, presented a petition of Gales & Seaton, stating, that they propose to publish a History of Congress, from the commencement of the Government to the present day, and praying the aid and patronage of Congress in their said publication; which was read, and referred to a select committee; and Mr. ROBERTSON, Mr. TYLER, Mr. HOPKINSON, Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, and Mr. SIMKINS, were appointed the committee.

Mr. SCOTT presented petitions of sundry inhabitants of the Territory of Missouri, praying that the said Territory may be admitted into the Union, as a State, on an equal footing with the original States; which were, together with the petitions of a similar nature, heretofore presented at the present session, referred to a select committee; and Mr. SCOTT, Mr. ROBERTSON of Kentucky, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. HENDRICKS, Mr. LIVERMORE, Mr. MILLS, and Mr. BALDWIN, were appointed the committee.

Mr. SCOTT also presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the southern part of the Territory of Missouri, praying for a division of the said Territory; which was referred to the committee last appointed.

The SPEAKER presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the counties of Lehigh and Northampton, in the State of Pennsylvania, stating the misconduct of certain officers of the militia of the said counties, whilst sitting on courts martial for the trial of persons who failed to perform their tour of duty under the requisitions of the President, during the late war; that they have improperly applied the public moneys coming into their possession, and that they have contracted unnecessary and improper expenses whilst acting on said courts martial, which are charged to the United States; and praying that the subject may be investigated, and the abuses of which they complain corrected.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BLOUNT, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill to augment the salary of the Postmaster General; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS made a report on the petition of Renner and Heath, which was read; when, Mr. W. reported a bill for the relief of Daniel Renner, and Nathaniel H. Heath, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was referred the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act fixing the compensations of the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, and of the clerks employed in their offices," reported the agreement of the committee to the said amendments, and they were committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RHEA, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, made a report on the petition of Ebenezer Stevens and others, which was read; when, Mr. R. reported a bill for the relief of Ebenezer Stevens and Lucretia Stevens, late Lucretia Sands, and others, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HUGH NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to extend the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, to cases arising under the law relating to patents," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Harold Smyth; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. THOMAS M. NELSON, from the committee appointed on the 18th of December last, to inquire into the expediency of extinguishing the Indian title to certain lands within the State of Kentucky, granted by the State of Virginia, to her officers and soldiers in the Revolutionary army, made a report, in part, which was read; when, Mr. N. reported a bill making appropriations for the purpose of extinguishing Indian claims, which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and returning surveys thereon to the General Land Office, and for designating the western boundary line of the Virginia military tract."

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the committee appointed for the purpose, reported a bill authorizing the election of a delegate from the Michigan Territory, to the Congress of the United States, and extending the right of suffrage to the citizens of said Territory, which was read the first time.

Mr. TALLMADGE, from the committee on that part of the President's Message which relates to roads, canals, and seminaries of learning, reported a bill authorizing the subscription of stock in the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal Company; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate, "in addition to an act making appropriations for repairing certain roads therein described."

Mr. MERCER, from the committee to whom it had been referred, reported the resolution from the Senate directing the publication of the journal of the convention, with an amendment, proposing the publication of the Secret Journals of Congress, and its correspondence with foreign Powers, prior to the Treaty of Peace with Great Britain in 1783.

Mr. BASSETT moved further to amend the said resolution by striking out these words: "of which one copy shall be furnished to each member of the present Congress."

The motion to amend was rejected by the House, and the resolution was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

The House took up the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to provide for delivering up persons held to labor or service in any of the States or Territories who shall escape into any other State or Territory," and being read, were again ordered to lie on the table.

The House then, in Committee of the Whole, considered the report unfavorable to the petition of James Buftiel, which, notwithstanding the earnest opposition of Mr. CLAGETT, was concurred in.

Ordered, That one thousand four hundred copies of the Message from the President of the United States, of the 14th instant, upon the subject of our relations with Spain, together with the documents accompanying the same, be printed for the use of the members of this House, in addition to the usual number heretofore ordered.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate making appropriations for repairing and keeping in repair certain roads, from Fort Hawkins to Fort St.

Stephens, and from Columbia in Tennessee, by the Choctaw Agency, to Madisonville in Louisiana. To the same Committee had been referred a bill, reported to-day, respecting the Chesapeake Canal.

Mr. H. NELSON spoke a short time in opposition to the bill, viewing it as a part of a system of encroachment on State rights, which ought to be resisted in every stage and under every form.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, supported the bill against Mr. NELSON's objections, and on its own merits. He supported it also on the ground that, in this instance, no authority but the United States could make the road, since it passed over a tract of country to which the Indian title is not yet extinguished, and over which the jurisdiction of the United States is not disputed.

Mr. FORSYTH and Mr. POINDEXTER also supported the bill on the same ground, and Mr. NELSON replied.

No amendment having been proposed to this bill, the Committee proceeded to the consideration of another bill, reported this morning, and which had been referred to the same Committee, authorizing the subscription to the stock of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company.

The consideration of this bill gave rise to debate, in which the gentlemen named below took part—

Mr. McLANE explained, at some length, the advantages of the contemplated canal, as connecting the waters of Delaware with those of the Chesapeake Bay, and stated the views of the Company in desiring to interest Congress in the work.

[From the elucidation of this business by Mr. McLANE, it appears that the original stock of the Company was $400,000, of which about $150,000 have been paid up and expended. The State of Pennsylvania has agreed to take an additional stock to the amount of $75,000; Maryland to the amount of $50,000, and Delaware to the amount of $20,000, provided the United States agreed to take shares to the amount of $150,000. The estimated expense of the work is $800,000; the balance is expected to be made up by individual subscription.]

Mr. BASSETT, under the belief that Congress had not the power to appropriate the public money for the purpose designated in the bill, moved to strike out the whole of the bill, after the enacting clause.

Mr. PITKIN wished for something more definite, respecting this proposition, than was to be found in the bill. He wished to know what control the United States were to have over the location or expenditure on the canal; whether they were to have the appointment of any portion of the directors, &c. It appeared that Pennsylvania and Maryland had agreed to take a certain number of shares, provided the United States did the same; but, even after these joint subscriptions were added to the funds of the company, there would yet be a deficiency of three or four hundred thousand dollars, as only a part of the subscribed capital was forthcoming. Respecting canals generally, Mr. P. did not consider them as objects of profitable investment of money; yet, he acknowledged, there might be canals of such great national importance, that the Legislature would be justly induced to subscribe to them. But, before he enlisted in any project of the kind, he wished to know the extent to which he was going. To afford some time to understand this subject, he moved that the Committee rise and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. BALLARD SMITH inquired whether the Committee on Internal Improvement intended to report any general bill for internal improvement. Whether they did or not, it appeared to him that the House should have before it at one view the several propositions for great national improvements, that the merits of each might be examined and compared, collectively and separately.

Mr. TALLMADGE, of New York, said he believed he was authorized to state that the select committee did contemplate to submit a system of internal improvements for the consideration of the House. He regretted the state of his health had prevented him from taking part in the late debate on the subject, as it was his intention to have pointed out a summary of the plan in his opinion the most proper to be adopted. At this time it was only proper for him to state, that the committee had reported the present bill making provision for repairing the roads therein mentioned, because they deemed it of essential importance to that district of country. The intercourse with Louisiana was greatly dependent upon it, and it was essential to the convenient supplies for the Southern army, now under General Jackson, that the roads mentioned in the bill should be repaired. The situation of those roads, and the necessities of that part of the country, would not admit of delay; and, therefore, the committee had yielded to the pressure, and had reported the present bill in anticipation of the system contemplated by them.

Mr. T. said, he had no doubt that it had now become an imperative duty for the committee to recommend, and the country to adopt, a system of internal improvement, calculated to provide for the national defence, and which would, at the same time, promote commerce between the States, and facilitate the progress of the mail. That, in deliberating upon this subject, the committee had viewed with anxious solicitude the recent situation of the country during the late war; that, with an extensive territory, and possessing within ourselves the products and the abundance of almost every climate, our coasts had been under a blockade, and for the want of the means of internal intercourse our country had suffered many privations. We had seen the Southern planter overloaded with the superabundance of his products, and yet, unable from the state of the country to carry them to market, he was suffering under poverty and want; we had seen the manufactories of the Eastern States shut up and discontinued, and that portion of the people reduced to distress, and almost to ruin, for the want of the raw materials from the South, with which to proceed in their beneficial labors; and while the South and the East have thus severely suffered from the inability to interchange and relieve each other's wants, we have witnessed a people and an army on the Northern and Western frontier, suffering every privation, and almost naked from the want of those fabrics which the manufactories of the East would gladly have wrought from the products of the South. Thus, in the possession of every means, and with abundance to answer every demand, but without the facilities of interchange and of internal intercourse, our country has experienced the privations of every want and the expenses of every disadvantage. To remedy some of these defects, and to guard against like calamities in future, the committee contemplate to recommend internal improvements on the Atlantic coasts, tending to provide for the common defence, and, by uniting Georgia to Maine, more effectually to consolidate the Union. As a part of this system, they have this day reported a bill to aid in uniting, by a canal, the Chesapeake and the Delaware.

Mr. T. said, the select committee had also viewed the Columbia road as a work of great national importance, and which required provision for its completion, and strongly exemplified the inefficiency of State authority to consummate such objects, and the duty of the Union to secure its completion. He said that road ran through three States, Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, all of which were less interested in the road than the District of Columbia, or the Western States, towards which the road pointed; and that its completion was therefore justly considered a subject of great national importance, and upon which the safety and welfare of the Western States, in a military and commercial point of view, materially depended. It also strongly exemplified that class of improvements which were intimately connected with the prosperity of the Union, and justly became objects of national legislation, and as distinguished from transverse roads through towns and counties for local accommodation, and which properly formed a subject of local legislation and State jurisdiction. Sir, said Mr. T., it is a fact worthy the observation of the House, that, while the unanimous opinion of the nation requires the Government to establish forts and defend the Western frontier—that while the subject of internal improvement has been before us—that while we have been debating upon the power of our Constitution, which commands us to provide for the common defence and general welfare, the War Office is actually settling accounts, and paying at the rate of one hundred and twenty-seven dollars per barrel for pork consumed in our Western garrisons. I mention not this fact, said Mr. T., as finding fault with the Administration, or with any department. They have no alternative but to surmount by expenditures the difficulties of transportation. But shall we require the Government to defend the country, and sit here debating and doubting our power to provide adequate means? Shall we witness the necessity of such wasteful extravagance, and yet refuse the remedy by a rational system of internal improvements? It is but to exhaust the treasures of our country and participate in a political suicide. Sir, said Mr. T., the exigencies of the Western frontier, and the unanimous expression of the nation, have called aloud for the late naval armament on Lake Erie—an armament which produced such important benefits to the country, and reaped for our nation such an abundant harvest of glory. The munitions of war for that armament were sent from the Seat of Government. The distance is less than four hundred miles, and yet, from the inability to pass from this place direct to Erie, I am informed at the Navy Department, that all the articles were transported by the way of Albany, a distance of nearly nine hundred miles transportation. The cost of a cannon at this place is nearly four hundred dollars, while the expenses of transportation on this circuitous and protracted route was from one thousand five hundred to two thousand dollars for each gun. Mr. T. said from information that he had derived from the War and Navy Departments, he was authorized to say, that the expenses of transportation on the Western frontier, during the late war, would have opened turnpike roads through the Western States.

To remedy these and like inconveniences, of which Mr. T. said, he had suggested only a small portion, and with a view to relieve the country from such exorbitant expenses, incident to the present rate of transportation, he was happy to answer to the inquiries that had been made, that the select committee did contemplate to submit for the consideration of this House objects of internal improvement worthy the national attention, and that the committee would proceed as fast as this House should evince a willingness to cherish the subject, and lay aside those Constitutional scruples which had presented such serious obstacles to legislation on this subject.

Mr. FORSYTH made some remarks to show the impracticability of devising any general system of improvement. To attempt to embrace in one bill all necessary improvements, would be to defeat every proposition of that sort, since it was impossible to reconcile all the jarring interests of the various sections of the Union. The House must, therefore, to act with effect, decide on the various propositions as presented to them, on their own merits.

Mr. TALLMADGE again spoke, and added some illustrations of his former observations.

Mr. TUCKER spoke in favor of the bill before the Committee. There was no subject of internal improvement, about which there was a more general assent in favor of it than there was in regard to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal.

Mr. PITKIN again rose, to protest against legislating on this subject, without any precise information of the extent of the system into which it was proposed to enter. When the bill for appropriating the bonus of the Bank of the United States, for the purpose of internal improvement, passed at the last session, a specific sum was proposed as the limit, and Congress knew the extent to which they were to go. Were the United States, he again asked, to become stockholders, and to have no share in the management of the affairs of the canal? Having an interest in the improvement, it ought also to have some share in the management of it. He did not object to the power of Congress to appropriate money for these purposes, but he desired to see a limit to the expenditure, &c.

Mr. MERCER opposed the motion in a speech of some length. As to the management of the affairs of this company, he had no apprehension of its not being in safe hands, since the charter had been granted by the enlightened Legislature of one State, and approved by two others, who had determined to invest a part of their funds in it. Although he agreed that a general principle should be established for the regulation of future improvements, yet, as a company already exists for opening this canal, and the work is already commenced, he thought it might well, considering the great importance of the object, be made an exception to the general provision. Although, he further remarked, he should be well disposed to vote for a general system of improvement very analogous to the system embraced by the bill of the last session, which had been referred to, he should be sorry to see the improvement of the country restricted to the narrow limits of that bill; he should be very sorry that the national system of internal improvement should move with no greater celerity than would be produced by the appropriation to that object of the stock of the Government in the Bank of the United States. The objects to be effected were of primary importance; and, if restricted to the tardy pace at which the limited amount of three or four hundred thousand dollars annually would impel them forward, centuries must elapse before even a foundation could be laid of a system of internal improvement commensurate with the extent and resources of the country.

Mr. SERGEANT, of Pa., opposed the motion by arguments favorable as well to the particular object before the House, as to canals generally. The canal, from the Delaware to the Chesapeake, being one of unquestionable utility, of great national importance, one to which the nation would apply its resources, if at all, if this bill did not pass, there was no hope of any practical result from the late decision of the House, &c. In regard to a general system of appropriating money, to be expended in the States according to their representation in Congress, Mr. S. showed that that system would not answer; since the proportion of Delaware, for instance, would be wholly inadequate to the completion of this canal, which is to run within the State of Delaware, and yet is more important to Pennsylvania and Maryland than to her, and is of very general importance to the United States, &c.

Mr. PITKIN again spoke of the necessity of a clear view of the magnitude and expense of the undertaking. Our redundant Treasury, on which gentlemen appeared to calculate, would not last a great while, he believed. What was to be the future situation of the country, who would undertake to say? The Spanish negotiation, it appeared, was broken off; the result of that business no one could foretell any more than they could what other uses we may have for money hereafter, &c.

Mr. LOWNDES said, that, before acting on a proposition of this kind, the House ought to have before it ample information, not oral merely, but official, relative to the present pecuniary situation of the company, the value of its property, the amount of debts it owes, &c. While he was disposed to favor internal improvement, he thought that, in relation to any particular project, the House should inquire fully and accurately, and have the facts laid on their table, &c. He did not suppose that any member was so much attached to the cause of internal improvement that he would rush into it blindfold, without being prepared by proper information.

Mr. McLANE said, in reply to the suggestion of Mr. LOWNDES, that the subject had already been before Congress, at different times, and in a variety of forms, and ample reports of all the facts had been made, which were to be found among the records of the House. There would be found all the facts relative to the original amount of stock, the amount subscribed, the amount paid, &c. And, on examining the statutes of Pennsylvania and Maryland, it would be found that such acts had been passed by them respectively, as he had described. In regard to a system, which some gentlemen desire to see, he said that it was not possible to say how far Congress might choose to go, but each gentleman had it in his power to say how far he would go. It was no objection to this proposition, that gentlemen did not know how far Congress might think proper to go hereafter. Mr. McL. showed the great importance of this canal in a national point of view, as connecting military posts, and affording the means of effectual defence. Keeping up but a small military force, it was the duty of Congress to provide the means by which that force and the munitions of war could, when necessary, be transported wherever wanted. The canal could be of little advantage to Delaware in any view, but was of great importance as a measure of national defence. To obviate the objection which some gentlemen had expressed to this appropriation, Mr. McL. read a proviso, leaving the subscription at the discretion of the President, after he shall have satisfied himself, by inquiring into the charter, &c., that the money may be safely invested.

Mr. LOWNDES did not consider it a sufficient answer to his suggestion, that information might be obtained by searching the statutes of the States. The very circumstance that the bill was only this morning reported, was a sufficient reason for deferring a decision on it. He knew of no object of internal improvement more worthy of attention than that in question; but he wished to see further information on the subject. He should, therefore, vote for the Committee's rising, with the hope that, in some shape, there would be spread on the table of the House, that information without which they could not prudently act.

The Committee then rose, reported their assent to the bill respecting the Alabama and Tennessee roads bill, and reported progress on the canal bill.

The bill first mentioned was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, by yeas and nays—83 to 55, as follows:

TUESDAY, March 17.

Mr. BLOUNT presented a petition of the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, praying permission to withdraw the locations of certain lands in that State, heretofore appropriated by the General Government, for the use of colleges and academies, and to be permitted to cause other lands to be located and laid off in the same tract of country for the use of the said colleges and academies, with power to sell the same. As also that they may be authorized to grant or sell any vacant land which may be left within the limits of the country described in the first section of the act of April, 1806, "authorizing the said State to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described, and to settle the claims to the vacant and unappropriated lands within the same," at such price, and upon such terms, as the General Assembly of the said State may deem proper.

Mr. MARR presented another petition of the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, relating to the subject of land titles in that State, derived from the State of North Carolina, and praying that they may be authorized to proceed to perfect titles west of the Elk river line, upon all unsatisfied claims which exist against North Carolina, and which are good and valid.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of General Moses Porter, which was read twice and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. TALLMADGE and Mr. MILLS were appointed of the Committee on Foreign Relations in the places of Mr. GOODWYN, deceased, and Mr. ORR, who is absent on leave.

The resolution from the Senate "directing the publication and distribution of the journal and proceedings of the Convention which formed the present Constitution of the United States," was read the third time and passed, as amended.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act to vest, in trust, certain sections of land in the Legislature of the State of Ohio;" and "An act allowing additional salary and clerk hire to the surveyor for the Illinois and Missouri Territories, and for other purposes;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The said bills were respectively read twice and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill authorizing the election of a delegate from the Michigan Territory to the Congress of the United States, and extending the right of suffrage to the citizens of said Territory, was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the Committee on the Judiciary was instructed to inquire into the expediency of altering so much of the laws now in force for regulating the Territorial governments of the United States, as requires a freehold property in the Territories respectively as a qualification for office.

The bill for the relief of Abraham Byington, and the bill for the relief of Purley Keyes and Jason Fairbanks, severally passed through Committees of the Whole, and were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then went into Committee on the bill to suspend the act of limitations, so far as regards certain loan office and final settlement certificates; which, having received sundry amendments, was reported to the House, the amendments concurred in, and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The SPEAKER laid before the House, a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting his report on the petition of John Killgore, which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

RULES OF THE HOUSE.

The House then, on motion of Mr. TAYLOR, proceeded to consider the amendment to the rules and orders of the House, submitted by him on the 10th instant.

Mr. TAYLOR explained the advantages which he conceived would result to the business of legislation by the adoption of this rule; the particulars in which it differed from a similar proposition offered at a former session by Mr. HOPKINSON, its exemption from the objectionable features of the former proposition, &c.

Mr. HOPKINSON supported the proposition, and briefly recapitulated the unnecessary repetition of labor of committees, &c. which it would prevent, the expedition which it would produce in acting on the public business, &c.

The proposition was then agreed to, without a division, as follows:

"After six days from the commencement of a second or a subsequent session of any Congress, all bills, resolutions, and reports, which originated in the House, and at the close of the next preceding session remained undetermined, shall be resumed and acted on in the same manner as if an adjournment had not taken place."

JAIL IN ALEXANDRIA.

The bill making an appropriation for the erection of a jail, and authorizing the Levy Court to erect, at their own expense, a court-house, &c. in the county of Alexandria, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was reported without amendment.

On the question of ordering the said bill to be engrossed, some debate arose, in which Messrs. HERBERT, FORSYTH, CORB, and PINDALL, advocated the appropriation, and Messrs. BEECHER, SOUTHARD, and LIVERMORE, opposed it, on different grounds.

Mr. LINN moved to strike out the first section, (making the appropriation for the jail,) which was agreed to; and the remaining sections, after some discussion, were, with the addition of an enacting clause, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

THE LAWS IN MISSISSIPPI.

The House went next into Committee on the bill providing for the due execution of the laws of the United States in the State of Mississippi.

Some conversation took place on the amount of compensation proper to be allowed to the district judge to be created in the State.

Mr. POINDEXTER moved and advocated the sum of two thousand dollars, in which he was supported by Mr. CLAY, a liberal allowance being contended for on the ground of the peculiar and burdensome duties to be performed, and the sacrifices to be made by the district judge, there acting also as circuit judge.

The motion to fill the blank with two thousand dollars was carried—57 to 55.

Mr. POINDEXTER then moved a salary of five hundred dollars to the United States attorney, in the new State, instead of two hundred dollars, which had been reported by the Judiciary Committee, which motion was disagreed to; also, successive motions to insert four hundred and three hundred dollars.

The Committee then rose, and the House taking up the amendments, the sum of two thousand dollars, inserted as the salary of the judge, was, after some discussion, concurred in, 64 to 48.

and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

NEUTRAL RELATIONS.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill in addition to "An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," and to repeal the acts therein mentioned, (to enact into one, with amendments, the several acts heretofore passed to enforce the neutral obligations of the United States.)

Mr. FORSYTH rose in explanation of the views of the Committee of Foreign Relations in proposing this bill, which was the result of the general inquiry into the various existing acts on this subject which had been referred to them, and which it was presumed answered the intentions of the House in directing the inquiry. Mr. F. briefly recapitulated the history of the several laws passed on this subject, from the act of 1794, rendered necessary by the French revolution, and the want of sufficient power in the Executive to enforce on our own citizens the observance of neutrality, down to the act of the last session; and concluded by explaining the amendments which the committee had deemed necessary to the strict impartiality of the provisions of the general bill they had reported.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, after submitting his reasons for disputing the propriety of some of the former acts; for believing that the provisions of the present bill exceeded the obligations imposed on us by a just regard to neutral duties, and went further than the neutral acts of any other nation—moved, first, to strike out the following proviso:

"That if any person so enlisted, shall, within thirty days after such enlistment, voluntarily discover upon oath to some justice of the peace, or other civil magistrate, the person or persons by whom he was so enlisted, so as that he or they may be apprehended or convicted of the said offence, such person so discovering the offender or offenders, shall be indemnified from the penalty prescribed by this act."

This motion was agreed to without a division.

Mr. CLAY offered some general remarks on the offensive nature of the bill, which, he said, instead of an act to enforce neutrality, ought to be entitled, an act for the benefit of His Majesty the King of Spain. He also expressed his unwillingness thus to be called on to re-enact laws already in force, of which he did not wish to have now the labor of investigating their principles, or the responsibility, if wrong, of renovating and participating in them. Sufficient, he thought, for the day, was the evil thereof; and he was sorry the committee had not contented itself with bringing forward some original proposition, without hunting out and bringing up for re-enactment all the old laws heretofore passed on the subject. There was a great difference between suffering acts to remain unrepealed, and bringing them up for re-enactment, and he gave notice that, after this bill should be made as perfect as its friends could make it, he should submit a single proposition to leave the act of 1794 in force, and to repeal the acts of 1797 and of 1817. Mr. C. concluded by moving to strike out of the second section the words which make it penal for a person to "go beyond the limits or jurisdiction of the United States, with intent to be enlisted or entered," in the service of any foreign Prince or State.

Mr. FORSYTH opposed the motion, and observed, that after the great labor which the committee had undertaken on this subject, at the instance of the Speaker, (Mr. CLAY,) they had some reason to complain of his remarks on the course they had taken. A general inquiry into the subject and revision of the acts had been referred to them, and the committee had found it easier and better to amend and bring into one general bill all the acts, than to adopt any other course. Mr. F. said that, so far from operating unfairly against the cause of the patriots, this bill removed certain provisions of the act of 1797, which bore exclusively on that cause, denouncing the severest penalties against those of our citizens who aid them, which this bill would render equal and impartial. Mr. F. adduced some arguments to show the propriety of retaining the provision moved to be stricken out; but, after some conversation between Mr. CLAY and Mr. FORSYTH, the question was taken, and Mr. CLAY's motion agreed to without a count.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, objected to the penalties proposed by the bill, as unreasonably severe, and, instead of a fine of $10,000, and ten years imprisonment which the judge might, at his discretion, impose on the offender—moved to substitute $2,000 and three years.

This motion was opposed by Messrs. FORSYTH, SMITH of Maryland, LIVERMORE, and RHEA, and supported by Messrs. ROBERTSON of Louisiana, CLAIBORNE, and BALL.

The question being divided, the motion to reduce the fine was negatived—ayes 40; and the motion to reduce the limit of imprisonment was carried—62 to 60.

Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, moved to amend the section so as to leave it to the discretion of the judge to inflict both fine and imprisonment, or one only, instead of being obliged, as the bill stood, to impose both, if either.—Negatived—ayes 55.

Mr. HERRICK moved to reduce the fine to $5,000; which was also negatived.

After some other unsuccessful motions of minor importance—

Mr. FORSYTH moved to strike from the third section the provision which makes it penal for any citizen to fit out or arm, without the jurisdiction of the United States, any ship or vessel with intent to commit hostilities upon the citizens or subjects of a friendly State—leaving in this section only the provision against such citizens of the United States as shall, beyond our jurisdiction, fit out vessels to commit hostilities against the citizens of the United States.

This motion produced a good deal of debate, principally on the expediency of striking out the whole section, and on the impropriety of still retaining a feature in the bill which would admit the possibility of a crime so monstrous and improbable as that of citizens going abroad to commence war upon the citizens and commerce of their own country, and which, even if committed, would be punishable either as treason or piracy.

MESSRS. CLAY, ROBERTSON, FORSYTH, SMITH of Maryland, and PITKIN, joined in the discussion; but, before any question was taken, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 18.

Mr. HARRISON presented a petition of Nathaniel Champe, on behalf of himself, and the widow and other children of John Champe, deceased, sergeant major of Lieutenant Colonel Henry Lee's squadron of dragoons, in the Revolutionary army, praying that some provision may be made for the support of his mother, and that a grant of land may be made to himself and her other children, in consideration of the secret, but eminent and highly important services, rendered by their father, under the orders and directions of the late General Washington.—Referred to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. H. NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the resolution from the Senate "directing the distribution of the laws of the fourteenth Congress among the members of the fifteenth Congress," reported the same with an amendment, which was read and concurred in, and the amendment ordered to be engrossed, and the resolution read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, reported a bill for the relief of Samuel F. Hooker; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. HERBERT, from the District Committee, reported a bill to incorporate the Medical Society of the District of Columbia; which was read twice, and committed.

The engrossed bills for the relief of General Moses Porter; authorizing the election of a Delegate from the Michigan Territory to the Congress of the United States, and extending the right of suffrage therein; for the relief of Abraham Byington; for providing for the erection of a jail and court-house in the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia; for providing for the execution of the laws of the United States within the State of Mississippi; and for authorizing the payment of certain certificates—were severally read a third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of Purley Keyes and Jason Fairbanks was read a third time; but, being opposed by Mr. OGDEN and by Mr. SPENCER, was rejected.

Mr. PINDALL moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill "in addition to the 'act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States,' and to repeal the acts therein mentioned," and that the same be indefinitely postponed.

On this motion some debate took place—Mr. P.

grounding it on the idea that it was certain nothing practical could result from the further discussion of the subject, &c., and that there was much business of practical importance before the House.

The motion was opposed, but succeeded, by a vote of 72 to 62.

CASE OF MR. HERRICK, AND OTHERS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Elections on the cases of Mr. Herrick, Mr. Earle, and Mr. Mumford, members of this House.

Mr. ADAMS opposed this report, in a speech of moderate length; when

Mr. CLAY, without entering into the subject before the House, moved that the Committee rise, with a view to give an opportunity for some gentleman to move a reconsideration of the vote for indefinite postponement of the bill last mentioned, that he might have an opportunity to move a specific proposition for amending that bill, which he had yesterday pledged himself to move, &c.

After debate, this motion succeeded; and the House having agreed to reconsider the vote of postponement, again resolved itself into a Committee, on the bill above mentioned.

THE NEUTRALITY BILL.

A motion (made yesterday) to amend the fourth section of the bill, was now agreed to—the effect of which was to confine the provisions of that section to the punishment of any citizens of the United States who should fit out vessels to cruise against the commerce of the United States, leaving out what related to the commerce of foreign nations.

Mr. CLAY rose to propose an amendment he had before indicated. Amended as it had been, Mr. C. said he had no objection to retaining the fourth section; but moved to strike out all the remainder of the bill, except so much as retains the provisions of the act of 1794, and repeals the acts of 1797 and 1817—the simple effect of which amendment would be to repeal the act of 1797 and that of 1817. In the propriety of repealing the act of 1797 he understood the chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations to concur. Of course, then, it would only be necessary to show that the act of the last session ought to be repealed; and that it goes beyond any neutral duty we can owe. In the threshold of this discussion, Mr. C. said, he confessed he did not like much the origin of that act. There had been some disclosures, not in an official form, but in such a shape as to entitle them to credence, that showed that act to have been the result of a teasing on the part of foreign agents in this country, which he regretted to have seen. But, from whatever source it sprung, if it was an act necessary to preserve the neutral relations of the country, Mr. C. said it ought to be retained. But this he denied. The act was predicated on the ground that the existing provisions did not reach the case of the war now raging between Spain and the South American provinces. In its provision, it went beyond the obligations of the United States to other Powers, and that part of it was unprecedented in any nation, which compelled citizens of the United States to give bonds not to commit acts without the jurisdiction of the United States, which it is the business of foreign nations, and not of this Government, to guard against. Does the act of 1794, said Mr. C., embrace the case of the Spanish patriots? That was the question, and it was not worth while to disguise it. If St. Domingo was not included, as had been said, in the act of 1794, it would not follow that that act did not embrace the case of the Spanish patriots. What was the condition of St. Domingo? Had the Executive of the United States ever acknowledged, in regard to that war, that it was a civil war, respecting which the United States stood in a neutral relation? No such acknowledgment, he said, had ever been made, in respect to the war in that island, as had been expressly made by the Executive in regard to the war in South America, that it was a civil war. And, when the courts came to apply the law to cases before them, having the decision of the Executive to guide them, they must decide that the law of 1794 is applicable to both parties. The act of 1817, consequently, was wholly unnecessary to the object for which it was avowedly enacted, and was one of superfluous legislation. Mr. C. said he recollected with pleasure that he gave his negative to it; that every member from the State of which he was a Representative did the same. He recollected that sixty-three members of that part of this House, with whom it had been, and would always be, his pride and pleasure to act, had recorded their votes against it. The voice of the country had since pronounced its doom, and left for Congress nothing to do but to repeal the act. Disguise it as you will, said he, the world has seen the act in its true character; has regarded it as a measure calculated to affect the struggle going on in the South, and discovered that, however neutral in its language, its bearing was altogether against the cause of the patriots. How, asked he, is that war now carried on? But for the supplies drawn from this country through Havana for sustaining the army of Morillo, this modern Alva, whose career is characterized by all the enormities which have consigned to perpetual infamy the name of his great prototype; but for the supplies drawn through Havana, whose port is open to us only for the sake of those supplies, General Morillo could not have supported his army. This fact he had from the highest authority, from the commander of one of our national vessels who had been on a cruise in that quarter and had received it from the lips of Morillo himself. It becomes us, Mr. C. said, really and bona fide to perform our neutral obligations. He had seen and heard of circumstances respecting this subject, humiliating in the extreme. He had been told, for instance, that in the case lately argued in the Supreme Court of the United States, of some of those individuals tried in the court of the United States at Boston, not only was the Attorney General ready at his post, as he should be, to attend to it, but the attorney for the Massachusetts district was there to argue it also; and, not satisfied with this, a foreign agent was seen attending the court, to see probably that nothing was omitted, and not even a poor Amicus Curiae was there to speak for the accused. Such was the state of the case that the humanity of the Attorney General had interposed, and induced that highly meritorious officer to make some suggestions favorable to those individuals. Was there a man in this country, Mr. C. asked, who did not feel his conscience reproach him for that transaction?

The act of 1797 being given up on all hands, and the act of 1817 being, as he thought he had shown, unnecessary, he hoped his motion would prevail. If, however, contrary to his belief, the House should decide that the act of 1794 did not cover the case of the existing civil war, and the act of 1817 should be thought necessary to bring it within the provisions of the act of 1794, Mr. C. said he should, in that event, submit another proposition to amend the bill, predicated on the idea that some provision was necessary in addition to the act of 1794.

The motion of Mr. CLAY to amend the bill having been stated from the Chair—

Mr. FORSYTH said he was opposed to the motion, and could not but suppose the honorable Speaker himself was doubtful of its success, as he had drawn before the House a variety of considerations which had no bearing on the question. Mr. F. denied, in the first place, that public sentiment had condemned the act of 1817. It was true, indeed, that certain exclusive friends of liberty, at the head of presses in the United States, had condemned this act; but, so far as we have any expression of opinion from the great body of the people of the United States, from the thinking part of the community, the act had been approved. But the Speaker had informed the Committee that sixty-three members of the House had opposed that act, and that all the members from a certain section of the country were in favor of it. This was another point, Mr. F. said, on which he differed from the honorable Speaker. The act of 1817, as it stands, came into this House on the 3d of March, 1817, and was passed by a large majority, the yeas and nays not having been required on it. How the Speaker then had ascertained the political complexion of those who voted for the bill, Mr. F. knew not; as far as he recollected, a very small minority had voted against it. That part of the bill which had been objected to in this House, had been stricken out in the Senate, and the bill, so amended, and as it now stands, was scarcely opposed on its final passage. There was, therefore, no decided political sentiment expressed on the passage of the bill. But, to excite prejudice against the act of 1817, another ground had been taken, and a suggestion made, which, if true, was a reflection, not on the House, but on the gentleman whose eulogy the Speaker some days ago pronounced. The origin of this act had been imputed to the teasing of certain foreign agents near the United States. That the Message of President Madison, recommending that act, was in consequence of the representations of foreign Ministers, Mr. F. said he was ready to admit—not of reiterated importunities, but of a performance of their duty to their Governments by remonstrating against violations, by citizens of the United States, of obligations which we owe not to any one nation, but equally to all. A remonstrance had been made by the Portuguese Minister, a garbled representation of which had been published; a similar statement of facts had been made by the Minister of Great Britain, another by the Minister of France. All the foreign Ministers here had, in short, represented that citizens of the United States, engaged in cruises in patriot vessels, as they were called, fitted from our ports, committed depredations on the commerce of England, France, and Spain. What, Mr. F. asked, had been the duty of the President of the United States if these facts were true? Were not the United States bound to make reparation, if, without an effort to prevent it, we suffered depredations to be made, by our citizens and from our ports, on the commerce of nations in amity with us? The Government, he said, had heretofore recognised this principle, and had remunerated foreign citizens for property taken from them by citizens of the United States. The President, then, had barely performed an imperative duty in representing to Congress the insufficiency of the laws, &c.

But, Mr. F. said, he would never do the late President the injustice to state his views, when he had it in his power to quote his own language conveying them. [Mr. F. then referred to the President's Message, of last session, on which the neutrality act of March 3d, 1817, was founded.] He appealed to every other member of the House whether, in this recommendation, there was anything censurable; anything that the most fastidious could mark for reprobation. The act of 1817 was precisely correspondent with the Message, and, almost in so many words, an answer to it. It corrected the defects of the existing laws, and enabled the President of the United States, where there was strong ground to presume that a cruiser was about to violate the neutral relations of the United States, to arrest his departure until he should give bond not to violate the laws of his country. But this, the House had been told, was a most extraordinary provision, and unprecedented in the annals of civilized legislation. It was not necessary, Mr. F. said, for him to tell the House that, whenever a citizen of the United States or of any State is accused, on public ground, of intending to commit an offence against the authority of the laws, it is the duty of a magistrate to require him not only to give security not to commit a particular act, but to bind him over, in ample security, that he will not violate any of the laws. But it was objected, particularly, that it was required of a citizen to give bond to refrain, when beyond the jurisdiction of the United States, from certain acts. And was it not right to do so, when the United States were responsible for his conduct when beyond their jurisdiction? That was a question which had long been settled. And was there any hardship, Mr. F. asked, in requiring bond from a citizen that he will refrain on the high seas from acts affecting the character of the country, and involving it in disputes with foreign Powers? And yet there was nothing else in that act which even in the eyes of the honorable Speaker was reprehensible. But this provision had been said to be unprecedented. Why, Mr. F. said, our statute book is full of similar provisions. Every restrictive law of the United States; every law forbidding commercial intercourse, or regulating it with foreign nations, contains similar provisions. The laws prohibiting the slave trade contain similar provisions. If a person swear that he suspects another of intention to violate the laws against the slave trade, the person so suspected is required by the collector to give bond and security that he will not violate the law in this respect. And where, Mr. F. asked, was the impropriety of this provision? But there was a still stronger case: That of the act prohibiting intercourse with St. Domingo was perfectly parallel to the present; for, although the color of those who were there fighting for their liberty might make a difference in the policy of the Government, it could make none in the principles on which that policy was founded. It was well known, that, at the date of that act, a contest existed between the European colonists and the colored population of St. Domingo; the latter claiming a recognition of their liberty, the former claiming to reduce them to obedience. Did the United States permit the vessels of that Government, or pretended Government, to come here for military supplies? Did it permit the agent from St. Domingo to reside here, to grant commissions to privateers, to make representations to the Government, officially or unofficially, and to make appeals from the acts of the Executive to the Congress or the people? No, Mr. F. said, the Government of France asked from the justice of this country, to pass laws prohibiting any commercial intercourse with the citizens of St. Domingo, and an act was passed, for two years, and afterwards continued in force for two years longer, one of the provisions of which was similar to that one of the act of '17, which was so much reprobated by the Speaker.

Mr. F. concluded by remarking, that he thought he had said enough to satisfy the Committee that there was nothing in the origin of the act of 1817, or in any of its provisions, which required its repeal; but that it ought to remain on the statute book, amended as now proposed in the bill before the House.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, said he had voted against the act of 1817, and was now in favor of its repeal. Before coming to that question, however, he would remark that, when our situation was more critical, and when, in point of resources, we were infinitely weaker; when, in 1794, our citizens were engaged in behalf of the republicans of France, with a zeal infinitely more dangerous to the peace of the country than anything that has been exhibited in regard to the patriots of South America, the act of 1794 had been deemed sufficient to secure the observance of our neutral relations. Was our situation, he asked, more critical in 1817 than in 1794? If not, ought we to have been induced to take stronger measures by far than had been applied to the emergency of 1794? The administration of WASHINGTON not only deemed the act of that day sufficient, but cautiously limited its duration to two years. It had been subsequently renewed two or three times, and Congress had always been satisfied with its provisions. In 1817, however, a state of things somewhat similar occurs, but infinitely less critical, in consequence of another effort, by another people, to throw off the yoke of a despotic government. As the struggle of the people of France for liberty gave rise to the act of 1794, so that of the people of South America gave rise to the act of 1817, which was passed by Congress without the knowledge of any exterior pressure on the Government, or of the letter which had been mentioned, and other representations. It now appeared, that the act of 1817 was passed in consequence of representations of foreign nations, growing out of hostile feelings to the cause in which the people of South America were engaged. This, said Mr. R. might be a sufficient ground for the Ministers of Portugal, of England, and of France, to proceed upon—but shall we sympathize in their feelings on the subject, and be induced by them to pass acts to shackle our citizens, when it is so easy to trace their remonstrances to a general hostility to the cause of any people who are engaged in a struggle to ameliorate their condition by changing their form of government? It did not appear now he said, that that act had been passed so much with a view to do what was just to ourselves, as to accommodate the views of foreign nations. That, Mr. R. said, had been his objection to the act when it passed; and the more its causes and effects were developed, the more anxious he was to get rid of it, and to return to the statutory provisions of 1794, which, for a number of years, had been found sufficient.

The cases stated by the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations, (Mr. FORTYTH) as having induced the passage of the act of last session were already provided for by the act of 1794; he referred to cases of fitting out vessels in our harbors, and with them cruising against the commerce of foreign nations, prohibited in that act, under very heavy penalties. But the act of 1817 went a step further, and authorized the collector to stop any vessel manifestly built for warlike purposes, if it has a cargo on board which shows it to have been intended for such purposes, or having a crew, or for any other cause, justifying that suspicion. Mr. R. wished to know by what authority the Government undertook to say, that a vessel built for warlike purposes should not leave the ports and harbors of the United States. What breach of neutrality is it to suffer such vessels to depart our ports; and why are we required, in this manner, to cripple the operations of the shipholders and shipbuilders? Mr. R. strongly objected to the latitude of discretion given to collectors by the term "or for any other cause," which subjected the vessels of our citizens to vexatious detentions. This, he said, was one difference between the act of 1794 and that of 1817; but there was yet another. By the act of 1817, not only armed vessels, but vessels manifestly built for war, though built for sale only, were forbidden to go from our ports without giving bond that they were not to be employed in aiding or assisting any military expedition, &c., and so obviously unjust was this provision, that the gentleman himself had found it necessary to propose an amendment to narrow its scope. Mr. R. concluded by repeating, that he could see nothing in our situation which required a stronger act than was deemed sufficient in 1794, and he, therefore, hoped the acts of 1797 and 1817 would be repealed.

Mr. LOWDES commenced his remarks by redeeming the act of 1817 from the charge which had been alleged against it, as far as his opinion went, by declaring that act not to have been adopted in consequence of any foreign remonstrance, but to have been the deliberate expression of the judgment of this and of the other House; and, though he had listened with the greatest attention to the arguments of the gentlemen from Kentucky and Louisiana, they had failed to convince him that that deliberate expression of the opinion of Congress at the last session ought now to be reversed. But, he said, there was less difference on principle than he had expected to have found between those gentlemen and those who approved the act of the last session. The Speaker particularly had conceded that the acts were unlawful which that law was designed to prevent; and the only difference between us, said Mr. L., is that for the prevention of these unlawful acts we propose a remedy, which they will not accept. On the question of the criminality of enlistment in a war between two Powers with whom we are in amity, we perfectly agree. The opinion of the House and of the country, Mr. L. said, must be that, so long as we profess neutrality, we ought to observe it; that our neutral obligations should be fairly and honestly fulfilled. And it was because he thought it the duty of Congress to prevent our citizens, by requiring bond and security to that effect, from engaging in the existing war, that he was willing to continue the act which the Speaker proposed to repeal. He could not think, he said, that there was anything new in the act of 1817; not merely because similar provisions might be found in our own municipal regulations, but because analogous provisions existed in the laws of other nations. Mr. L. asked of the honorable Speaker, seeing that in time of war we require bond from privateers, before commissioned, that they will not violate the laws of nations, why in time of peace he would not require bonds from those suspected of the intention to violate them. Mr. L. considered it an imperfect view of the subject to suppose that the bond thus required was only to prevent injury being done to any one Power. Those who leave our shores to assail the property of one Power, may, when they get to sea, employ their arms against any and every nation. It was perfectly fair, certainly, that those who left our shores, with the means of mischief on board, should give that security against their involving the interests, and perhaps the peace of their country, which bonds, such as are required by the law of 1817, are calculated to afford. The gentleman from Louisiana appeared to think that there could scarcely be anything in the cargo of the vessel which ought to be taken as an indication of a warlike purpose. Now, Mr. L. said, though he did not think this clause material—not, however, that he would repeal a law because every syllable it contained was absolutely necessary—yet he thought that from the cargo the object of an expedition fitted from our ports might be readily inferred. Might there not, he said, be that preparation of fixed ammunition, &c., which would afford a strong presumption that the vessel was not intended for traffic, but prepared for war? He thought this might occur, where other proof would fail. Mr. L. took other views of this question. He said he could not regard this question as one of a mere fulfilment of our duties to the countries at war, as the vessels equipped in our ports might be employed against other countries with whom we are at peace, as well as against those belligerents. One consideration for such an act he would suggest, which it was too late for us to deny, that we are responsible for injuries done by vessels of the United States, after they leave our ports, before they arrive at a foreign port. For such depredations we are responsible, and have recognised the principle by paying claims founded on it. We have bound ourselves to respect the principle in a manner equally obligatory, by preferring claims founded on it against other nations. Having done so, every consideration of prudence, of respect for the character of our country, requires that we should exact the security which is demanded by the act of 1817. As regards those who desire to trade in vessels of war, it is necessary to provide, as has been provided, that it shall be carried on in a way beneficial to them, but compatible with the higher interests of the country. No duty, said Mr. L., is by the act of 1817 exacted from any individual which the Speaker does not think, as well as myself, ought to be performed; a bond only is exacted, in certain suspicious cases, that that duty shall be performed. Where the hardship, then; where the commercial inconvenience of being required to give bond that, while on the high seas, the suspected vessel shall not violate the laws of the country? The act of 1817 created no new duty, established no new prohibition; it only secured the execution of existing duties in a particular, for the failure to observe which the Treasury of the United States, and not the offending individuals, would ultimately be responsible. Mr. L.

would not say that the act merited none of the reprobation bestowed on it; but he would say that it had not been proved to contain any injurious or oppressive provisions.

Mr. CLAY said it was always with very painful regret that he found himself differing from the gentleman who had just taken his seat, and with the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations; and, when differing from them, he almost distrusted his own perceptions. But this was not the first time he had that misfortune; for his honorable friend (Mr. LOWDES) had been at the last session a powerful auxiliary in carrying through the bill which then passed, and was now proposed to be repealed. Notwithstanding his great regret at the circumstance, however, he must obey the dictates of his own judgment. Mr. C. said, he never had intimated that the act of 1817 did not originate in the judgment of this House, or that it was passed at the instance of any foreign Ministers; and yet, if he understood the gentleman from Georgia, he had admitted that the committee had had the benefit of the suggestions of several foreign Ministers. It was immaterial to him, Mr. C. said, whether the act sprang from any suggestion of foreign agents, or whether, after it was recommended, the letters of the Ministers were sent to the Committee of Foreign Relations. As to the foreign Ministers, Mr. C. said, in referring to them, he meant nothing disrespectful towards them—he would not treat with disrespect even the Minister of Ferdinand, whose cause this bill was intended to benefit; he, said Mr. C., is a faithful Minister; if, not satisfied with making representations to the foreign department, he also attends the proceedings of the Supreme Court, to watch its decisions, he affords but so many proofs of the fidelity for which the representatives of Spain have always been distinguished. And how mortifying is it, sir, to hear of the honorary rewards and titles, and so forth, granted for these services; for, if I am not mistaken, our act of 1817 produced the bestowal of some honor on this faithful representative of His Majesty—and, if this bill passes which is now before us, I have no doubt he will receive some new honor for his further success. No, Mr. C. said, he would never treat foreign Ministers to our Government with disrespect. But yet he was not entirely satisfied with the suggestions respecting the representations, garbled and ungarbled, of the foreign Ministers. In regard to the letter of the Minister of Portugal—a man whom Mr. C. said he highly venerated; whom he regarded as an honor to his country and an ornament to science—a man whose country could not have shown a greater respect for the United States than by deputing him as its representative to this Government—with regard to that letter, as the gentleman had charged the publication which had been made of it to be a garbled one, and it seemed by his confession (his precious confession, he would call it, but not in the obnoxious sense of the term) that he either had the document in his possession or had seen it, he hoped that he would lay it before the House in expenso, that they might see it in its ungarbled state, &c. But, having been contradicted in the statement he had made when up before, respecting the passage of the act of 1817, Mr. C. begged of the honorable gentleman, before he disputed any statement of his (Mr. C.'s) to take the trouble to examine whether he was himself correct. If the gentleman would turn to the Journal, he would find that, on the question to engross the bill, there were sixty-three in the negative. [Mr. FORSYTH explained; the bill thus ordered to be engrossed was not that which finally passed, which came from the Senate.] If, Mr. CLAY continued, the gentleman would look over the list of names recorded in the negative, he would find the name of one of the present Cabinet, the Secretary of War. The yeas and nays had also been taken on the proposition to postpone the bill indefinitely when it came back from the Senate; and, although owing to the period of the session, a smaller number voted on the bill, there were yet thirty-seven votes for postponement, to some sixty odd against it.

But, said Mr. C. it seems, that in the remarks which I have submitted, I have made some reflections on the late President of the United States. No such thing. But was there not, he asked, a considerable alteration, since the act of 1817, in our posture in respect to the war between Spain and the Provinces. The Executive had since declared to the whole world that the condition of the United States is one of neutrality in regard to the contest. Not that only, but that the war carrying on is a civil war, and that we owe to both parties all the obligations of neutrality—the obligations due to a party in a civil war being very different from those due to a people in rebellion, and demanding therefore a different state of our laws. But, returning to the late President of the United States—no man, Mr. C. said, had a more high sense of the exalted character and distinguished services of the gentleman to whom he thus alluded; but, whilst, said he, I am a Representative of the nation, I shall speak freely my sentiments, let them be in opposition to whom they may, whether the existing or any former Chief Magistrate of the United States. Mr. C. then called upon gentlemen to show that the act of 1794 was inapplicable to the existing conflict under the circumstances of the change of attitude, to which he had referred. The gentleman had contended it was not, because of a decision in the case of St. Domingo. That, Mr. C. said, was a case standing on insular ground, and totally different from the present. We admit the flag of the patriots: that President Madison did—we declare the contest to be a civil war: that President Monroe did—and commissioners have been sent there, if not with credentials, to hear and make representations. The Judiciary then would say, that the act of 1794 does include the case, and the act of 1817 would be superfluous and unnecessary, but for the further provisions contained in that act. Gentlemen had contended, that these further provisions were necessary, because it was proper to require bond and security from vessels departing from our ports, that they will not violate our neutral obligations without the territory of the United States. This proposition, Mr. C. could not reconcile with the admission he understood gentlemen to make, that acts committed out of our jurisdiction are acts of which foreign Powers must take care for themselves.

The bonds required by the restrictive systems, which had been referred to, were not analogous to the present case; they stood on peculiar ground, the measures they were necessary to enforce having been required by our own policy, in defence of our own rights and interests, and were not an act of legislation for the benefit of a foreign Power, for whom we are under no obligation to legislate. The difference in the two cases was precisely the difference between legislating for ourselves and legislating for others. But it had been said that bonds are required even from privateers in war. That is because they have commissions, said Mr. C., and, acting under our authority, constitute a particular part of the force of the community, and the bond is required for our own sakes. Whilst on this subject, he said, he could not see the cause for all this anxiety on the part of gentlemen, lest the patriots should get hold of a vessel prepared for war. Were they not aware that the whole marine of the island of Cuba consists of vessels purchased from this country? Ships are an object of commerce, condemned by no authority. It was particularly fitting, under present circumstances, that we should give every facility to the sale of our ships. Do we not know, said he, that owing to the condition of the world, our merchant vessels are cut out of employment, and that, unless we can sell them, they will rot at our wharves? Mr. C. laid it down as a principle, incontrovertible, that a ship, armed or not armed, was an object of commerce. Gentlemen would not deny, that the materials of armament might be separately sold, and afterwards combined. But the honorable gentleman from South Carolina had made one admission, which gives up the question, when he conceded that an armed ship might be fitted out—completely equipped—go to a foreign port, and afterwards go to war with any belligerent whatever, without a violation of our neutrality. And yet such a course, admitted by the gentleman to be lawful, was expressly forbidden by the act of 1817.

[Mr. LOWNDES briefly explained, not admitting the principle Mr. C. considered him as ceding, in the latitude given to it by the Speaker.]

Mr. C. said, he had conceived the principle to be fairly inferred from the course of the gentleman's argument; and he did not yet understand him as denying, that, after a vessel gets into a foreign port, and departs thence, our responsibility for its conduct ceases. And the gentleman had the other day admitted, in debate on another subject, the right of expatriation. Suppose, then, that any number of citizens of the United States should fit out an armed vessel to go to any port in Spanish America, and there expatriate themselves by becoming citizens of another country, might they not then engage in war under the flag of that country? Gentlemen would not deny it, and yet they would be forbidden to do so by the act of 1817.

Mr. C. stated further objections to this act. For example, the collector of a port might detain any vessel, when the number of men, the nature of the cargo, or any other circumstance, induce him to suppose the vessel is intended for cruising, with a belligerent purpose. Mr. C. said he was opposed to vesting such discretionary power in any collector. The voyage may be intended to Lima, to China, or any distant port, and the voyage may be totally defeated, and heavy loss incurred, by a mere caprice of the collector. Mr. C. wished his honorable friend (Mr. JOHNSON) to read a letter he had received from St. Bartholomews, stating that three vessels had arrived there from British ports, not only with skeletons of regiments, but with nearly all the men, on their way to join the patriots. Had these men, Mr. C. asked, been subjected to any bond and security—to any such onerous provisions as are contained in this bill? No, said he; we alone, it seems, are to stretch our power to its limit to prevent our citizens from aiding in any manner the efforts of those who are struggling for liberty in the South; whilst Great Britain, in this respect, pursues a policy which we might worthily imitate. While at peace, he admitted, we ought to perform our obligations of neutrality; but they did not require the passage of bills with neutral titles, but with provisions favorable to one only of the belligerents. What, on the other hand, had Great Britain done? She had issued a proclamation which almost recognises the independence of the provinces, calling the contest a war between America and Spain, and forbidding her citizens to engage in it, but requiring no bond and security from them. No, said Mr. C., she has gone a step further than she has ever before gone: her citizens, who constitute a part of the armies of Spain, she has forbidden from fighting against the patriots. I wish we might imitate her example, and observe a real neutrality, instead of that which exists in name only, to the prejudice of one party and not of the other.

In reference to the suggestions made by Mr. LOWNDES respecting spoiliations, Mr. C. asked, what success have we had in our applications for indemnity for spoiliations? We are told, very good-naturedly, indeed, by the Secretary of State, in a late communication—I am sorry we have not the benefit of that letter—though, when we get it, I presume we shall find it a compilation of other works on the same subject—the Secretary of State tells us, very good-naturedly, that we have patiently waited for the settlement of our differences with Spain, and it will require no very great effort to wait a little longer. Very good-natured, indeed! No change, say gentlemen, in the aspect of our relations with Spain? Yes, a most humiliating one, within the last three or four years. We were told by the President, in his message at the commencement of the session; and, ambiguous as the intimation was, hope clung to it as promising a change; that a disposition had been shown on the part of Spain, to move in the negotiation. And what sort of a motion was it? A motion which has terminated in something like a perpetual repose, waiting till the passions and prejudices of His Majesty of Spain may have time to subside. Admirable, Job-like patience, said Mr. CLAY. I thank my God, that I do not possess it.

Let us, said Mr. C., in conclusion, put all these statutes out of our way, except that of 1794. When was that passed? At a moment when the enthusiasm of liberty ran through the country with electric rapidity; when the whole country, en masse, was ready to lend a hand and aid the French nation in their struggle, General WASHINGTON, revered name! the Father of his Country, could hardly arrest this inclination. Yet, under such circumstances, the act of 1794 was found abundantly sufficient. There was, then, no gratuitous assumption of neutral debts. For twenty years that act has been found sufficient. But some keen-sighted, sagacious foreign Minister finds out that it is not sufficient, and the act of 1817 is passed. That act, said Mr. C., we find condemned by the universal sentiment of the country; and I hope it will receive further condemnation by the vote of the House this day.

Mr. LOWNDES rose to vindicate himself from the charge of inconsistency alleged against him by the Speaker; but which, he said, could not be properly established by taking a sentence or half a sentence from a speech, and founding an argument on it. The Speaker infers, said he, because I will not take measures to punish him who, without the jurisdiction of the United States, enters into a vessel armed by a foreign authority, and cruises on the property of foreign nations, that I must therefore be willing that a citizen of the United States, within the limits of the United States, in a vessel belonging to the United States, shall involve the Government in a responsibility for her acts, with equal impunity. Mr. L. submitted to the Committee, whether there was any resemblance between the two propositions.

Mr. FORSYTH explained the difference as to facts between him and the Speaker. If what the Speaker had advanced, respecting the vote on the act of 1817, had been intended as argument, Mr. F. said, he had endeavored to show that there was no weight in it, by showing that the vote to which the Speaker had referred was not on the bill which actually passed, but on a bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations which did not pass. The member of the Cabinet, who had been referred to, voted against the last-mentioned bill, but in favor of that which passed into a law, and there was a very small minority against it. With respect to the influence which produced the passage of the act of 1817, if there was any felt, it was by the President, and to him must be imputed the blame; for to him the remonstrances of the foreign Ministers had been addressed, and he had brought the subject before Congress. With respect to the correspondence with the Ministers, on the call of the committee for facts of depredations by our cruisers, these papers had been shown to them. I have no recollection, said Mr. F., of every word in one of the official notes, but I am sure that the version which has been given of it is not correct. I very well recollect, although not particularly remembering the particular words or arguments, that the tone of the letter and its manner were perfectly respectful to the Government, and such as might have been expected from the character of the Minister. It was neither indecent nor disrespectful; in the letter which is published as a copy of that, there are passages both indecent and disrespectful.

In reply to the suggestion, that even if the act of 1817 was required at the time it passed, it was no longer necessary, because of a change in our posture, Mr. F. said, he knew of no such change. As far as the independence of the provinces, or of any of them, was recognised at this moment, it had been at that day. If his memory was not, in this respect, treacherous, the President of the United States announced to the Spanish Minister, through the Secretary of State, in the correspondence between them laid before this House at the middle of the last session, that such was the relation in which we regarded them. This answer had been given to an application to exclude their flags from our ports.

To show that his construction of the decision of the Supreme Court on the act of 1794, as applied to the case of St. Domingo, was correct, Mr. F. quoted the words of the decision from Cranch's Reports. In Massachusetts, the case referred to by the Speaker, was that of an indictment for piracy, from which the accused sought to shield himself by a commission from one of the Governments asserting their independence. The judges composing the court differed on points of law. One of the questions was, whether a commission emanating from any revolted colony, district, or people, whose independence was not recognised by the Executive authority of the United States, was valid. Here was a question, very different from the present one raised by the courts of the United States, and brought up for decision; it was not decided, because the counsel for the party was not present, or for some cause of that description. This point being doubtful, it was highly proper that the act of 1817 should have removed all doubt on the subject. Under the act of 1794, it was doubtful whether the commission of certain acts was an offence under our laws or not; and a long course of litigation before the courts would have been necessary before the question would have been settled. It was better to settle the question, and clear the law of all doubt. In this view, the act of 1817 was necessary, independently of all other considerations, and ought not to be repealed.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, said, he would not have troubled the Committee, but that his views varied somewhat both from those of the Speaker and the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations. He was averse to the repeal of the entire act of 1817, but was in favor of the repeal of the two last sections of it; they were called the bond section and the collector's section. He stated why he was in favor of retaining the provisions of the act, except these two sections. That act had been framed with the view of extending the provisions of the act of 1794, prohibiting our citizens from taking part in a war between two independent nations, with whom we were at peace, to the case of the Spanish colonies and the mother country. The act spoke of "a foreign prince or state," and there had been in our courts a decision which seemed to indicate the necessity of using some farther designation in order to take in the case of the Spanish colonies. The first section of the act of 1817 differs from that of 1794, in little else than the addition of the words "colony, district, or people," after the words "prince or state." This amendment had been thought necessary last year. He had not been present when the bill was passed, and should perhaps have hesitated about passing any bill with views particularly to this contest. But there was a difference between passing the bill and repealing it. Spain could not complain of our leaving it undone. Her conduct had given her no peculiar claims upon us. He should, therefore, perhaps have voted against the law. But it is now a law; and to repeal at this time a provision which extends to her the provisions of the act of 1794, might perhaps justly be considered as unfriendly and hostile. And while he, therefore, viewed with as much interest as any gentleman the cause of the Spanish patriots, and viewed with as little approbation the course of the Spanish Government, he would avoid whatever might endanger the peace of the nation. He considered it our true policy to maintain peace if we can, without compromising the dignity of the nation. It is not less our interest now to avoid being entangled in South American affairs, than it was to avoid, in 1794, being implicated in European quarrels. He was, therefore, disposed to maintain, by all proper means, the neutrality of the United States; but it should be a dignified neutrality, not involving ourselves in difficulties, nor shrinking from what was due to our own character and standing among the nations of the earth. It was partly with this view that he was opposed to the last sections of the act of 1817. Spain has not entitled herself to expect this Government to go farther than they did in 1794, for the preservation of its neutrality. These sections do go farther. A gentleman now within the walls of the House, (Mr. PRESTON,) who was in Congress in 1794, tells me the attempt was made to introduce similar provisions into the act of that year. It was opposed by the most intelligent merchants, as embarrassing and oppressive, since it rendered it necessary that every East Indiaman, going armed, should be compelled to give bond before she could sail. Mr. Fitzsimmons, a distinguished merchant, was mentioned as opposing it. The proposal failed in 1794. Can Spain expect us, in her favor, to go farther than we would go then? By no means. Let us then leave the first section of the act of 1817 in force, and repeal the two last sections. This places Spain and the colonies on the same footing, as other nations are by the act of 1794. Mr. T. had specific objections to these clauses. The bond clause must be inconvenient to East India merchants. An intelligent East India merchant tells me that it is considered as an inconvenient provision at this day. It must be inconvenient; it holds every merchant to security, (who, from the nature of his trade, is obliged to go armed,) merely because some vessels have been illegally fitted out. It runs counter to the principles of our laws, to hold all to security lest some should break the law. The other section, he said, was more objectionable. It authorizes a seizure by the collector, upon suspicion; it puts into his hands powers that belong to the Judiciary; they are ample powers. If there be just ground of suspicion, on affidavit, a judge may issue his warrant against the offender; for, if his vessel has been fitted out, and the intent is illegal, the offence is completed before she sails. If there be not just ground of suspicion, the collector should not be permitted to seize; nor would I take the power of judging out of judicial hands, to place in the hands of the collector. Who is he? A person entitled to large emoluments in the case of condemnation of the vessel; an interested man, who, if he succeeds, requires a handsome sum, and, if he fails, applies to Congress to indemnify him, as he was acting in the line of his duty. He would repeat, that Spain had no right to expect us to introduce or to retain provisions so much at variance with correct principles, and which we did not think proper to introduce into the former laws for preserving our neutrality.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, was opposed to this motion, though he had made up his mind to give a silent vote on it, but for the remarks of the gentleman who had just spoken, (Mr. TUCKER.) He had the honor, he said, to be a member of the Committee of Foreign Relations at the last session, by whom the bill now called the act of 1817 was reported; and, as far as his recollection served him, if the Message of the President (which had been referred to) had not been submitted to that committee, they would have reported a bill nearly similar in its provisions to that which had passed. That letter, Mr. S. said, ought to be better understood. The Minister of the King of Portugal had received information, which afterwards proved to be correct, that Commodore Taylor had issued orders to privateers from the ports of the United States to capture the vessels of Portugal; and he apprized the Department of State that such expeditions were fitting out. The fact was, Mr. S. said, that those vessels, going from ports of the United States, did actually take such vessels, carry them into Buenos Ayres, where the Government decided that there was no authority on the part of Commodore Taylor to issue any such orders. The letter from the Portuguese Minister, Mr. S. said further, was couched in respectful terms, such as appeared proper and consistent with a correct view of his duties as a foreign Minister. It had been intimated that the President had been induced to address a Message on this subject to Congress, by the teasing of a foreign Minister. Did gentlemen suppose the President a man of that character to yield to such importunities? No; he was, in applying to Congress for more rigid provisions, mindful of his own country alone; and no reflection could justly apply to the President for his conduct on that occasion.

His friend from Virginia, Mr. S., said, had an objection to the act of 1817, bottomed on the bonds required by that act to be given in certain cases. What were those bonds? That an armed vessel, going from the ports of the United States, should not jeopardize the peace of the country. This it appeared had been represented to the gentleman from Virginia as a great inconvenience to persons engaged in the East India trade. I am myself, said Mr. S., engaged in that trade and a number of my constituents, and the constituents of various gentlemen here; and, if there be any inconvenience to them, why have they not remonstrated to this House against it? No such remonstrance has been forwarded; and yet, sir, the merchants are very mindful of their own convenience. One remonstrance had been presented from that class at the present session, representing that the fifteen days allowed by law was too short a time for discharging the cargo of a ship, and that the per diem allowance for all beyond that time ought to be modified or discontinued. This, Mr. S. said, was a trifling inconvenience, and yet the merchants remonstrated against it. As to the inconvenience of giving bonds, Mr. S. said, he who has no wish to do an unlawful act will have no objection to give bonds, which give no other trouble than the signature of his own name and that of two sureties. In civil society, for the benefit of the whole, individuals must submit to such inconveniences, and the merchants had always cheerfully done it. Why did we so? asked Mr. S. Because it was our interest that those who are disposed to do illegal acts may be detected and arrested in their designs. We give bond, said he, for the register of our ship, and, if we sell the vessel abroad, are bound to return the register. We could sell our vessels to great advantage abroad, if we could sell the registers also; but the security of the Government requires us to give bond to return them. To such inconveniences, like those of the act of 1817, required by the general good, I have never known merchants to refuse to submit—it is not their character. With regard to the other section, which the gentleman had objected to, Mr. S. did not conceive it very important; but it was intended to prevent vessels from being prepared in our ports for a cruise in every respect, except that their armament was not on deck, but ready to be put in a situation to make war immediately on leaving our ports. Such a vessel the collectors are authorized to detain; but from so doing gained no advantage, there being no forfeiture, &c.—so that they had no motive for pressing the execution of the strict letter of the law, and the power was not therefore subject to abuse, as had been supposed. The section, he said, had perhaps arisen from a circumstance which has cost the United States nearly two hundred thousand dollars—he referred to the case of the American Eagle, of New York, which vessel was supposed to be sold to one of the black Emperors, and had about her all the marks of such a destination; but, under the laws of the United States, was not condemned. That vessel was seized under a direct order of the Executive; but the collector had been adjudged to pay to the owner, for the seizure, $109,000 and interest, and Congress were bound to make good the money. If the section now objected to had then existed, this would not have happened. If a man means fairly, his enterprise will be above board, and there is no fear of his being subjected to a suspicion of an intention to do an unlawful act; if he acts otherwise, he ought to be restrained by bonds from carrying his intention into effect. I am of opinion, said Mr. S., we have an undoubted right to build vessels fit for war, and send them abroad and sell them to whoever will buy them; but, when we do so, we ought to have cargoes not contraband of war on board of them. If they have an innocent cargo, they have no occasion for arms, and may go unmolested where they please. And was there anything in the act of 1817 to prohibit such a trade? No; it prohibited only the fitting out of vessels from our ports for the purpose of depredating on the commerce of nations with whom we are at peace.

What, Mr. S. asked, was the nature of our difference with Spain? Was our claim on her for territorial possessions? No, he said, we possess the territory we claim, and it is for Spain to negotiate to dispossess us. Our claim against her is for spoliation committed on our commerce by French privateers whom she permitted to fit out from her ports, and bring in our vessels for sale. For this we justly demand indemnity. And what, he asked, had Spain replied? That we have a right to this indemnity, and she will pay it when she shall be able. Now, if a vessel, sailing out of our ports as a cruiser, obtains a commission we know not how, gives no bonds whatever, goes to sea and commences the capture of Spanish property, are we not responsible? In one case a vessel of that description sailed from our ports, and, without having visited any patriotic port, had captured an Indiaman and sent her into Buenos Ayres, where she sold for a million of dollars. That amount, Mr. S. said, he had been informed was already reclaimed from us. And, should we ask them to pay us for depredations on the property of our merchants, and refuse the same measure to them? Now, suppose that at that time bonds had been exacted, as by the provision of the act of 1817 so strongly objected to, with good and sufficient security, that vessel would not have gone out and involved the United States in heavy responsibilities by her unlawful acts.

If, as had been said, up to the last year, the act of 1794 had been deemed sufficient by successive Congresses, why had that of 1797 been passed subsequently? And, after all the acts that could be passed, it would be found, Mr. S. said, that some loop-hole would still be left through which a man may creep. In reply to the Speaker's demand, why such sympathy with the Spanish Government, Mr. S. said, that our sympathies were for ourselves, our acts were intended to keep ourselves within the rules of conduct prescribed by national law for neutral Powers; to maintain our own dignity, and prevent our citizens from involving us in war. Of a war with the present power of Spain, he said, nobody would think much; but a rule applied to Spain might be applied, by illegal cruisers from our ports, to other Powers, with whom a conflict would not be so very convenient. The House had been told that such conduct was not cause of war: it might not perhaps create a war at this moment—but, said he, whenever the Power thus injured feels itself strong enough to make a war, you will find that it will be always found a sufficient cause. If, Mr. S. said, the United States do permit vessels to be owned and fitted out in our ports and harbors, commanded and manned by American citizens, and to sail out and depredate on the commerce of a nation at peace with us, without our taking due means to prevent it, if that nation be able, she will consider it cause of war. Suppose we should thus be brought into a war, which is not impossible, and that Spain should fit out, in the ports of England and of France, privateers which never have gone and never intend to go into Spanish ports for commissions, but should commence their depredations on our commerce the moment they leave the ports where they were fitted out; suppose that we remonstrate with these Powers, and tell them that the practice is inconvenient and injurious to us, and they give to us the answer which has been given on this floor—I want to know, if, with the powers the Speaker can bring into action on such subjects, he would not rouse the feelings of every man in this House to resent the injury, considering it as cause of war. What! he would say, shall we stand by and see our commerce plundered, and our merchants robbed at our very doors by people not at war with us? We ought, therefore, Mr. S. said, by every provision that was necessary, to prevent our citizens from embarking in these expeditions. If the patriots ever have a commerce on the high seas, said he, on which depredation can be committed, we shall find our citizens fighting against one another; commissions will be taken from the Spanish monarch in the same manner as they now are from the patriots; and, money being the only object of those who engage in these expeditions, our citizens will be found in arms against each other, as either service may afford them the prospect of gain, &c.

Mr. CLAY again rose. He directed his first observations to what had fallen from Mr. TUCKER. If the decision of the judicial authorities had been, that the case of the patriots did not come within the act of 1794, there would be much force in his argument for retaining the least objectionable part of the act of 1817. If such a decision had been made by the Supreme Court, Mr. C. said, he did not know but he would go along with the gentleman; but such a decision had not been made, and, he thought he had shown, could not be expected.

The gentleman from Maryland, Mr. C. said, or himself, was totally mistaken as to the case of the Eagle. The Power of St. Domingo was not then considered as a State—[Mr. SMITH explained that he had not referred to that case with any view to that point.] Mr. C. said he had it from unquestionable authority, that in the case of Mr. Collector Gelston and the Eagle, the court had refused to grant the necessary evidence of the fact, "that there was probable cause" for the detention of the vessel; and that officer was consequently left to the operation of the law on a naked trespass. But, Mr. C. repeated, again and again, that the gentleman from Georgia would fail in the attempt to confound the virtuous struggle of the Patriots of South America with that of the contest of St. Domingo. There was a difference in the facts, as there was in our laws and policy respecting them. There was, in the case of St. Domingo, an absolute prohibition of intercourse, which took place, he admitted, at the instance of the French Minister; and we had not recognised the war as a civil war, &c., or in any manner so regarded it, as that a case arising under it in our courts could be viewed in the same light as a case occurring in the existing conflict in South America. In reply to the gentleman from Virginia, who seemed to think that that Power could not be considered as independent, whose independence had not been recognised by the United States, Mr. C. said that was not a clear case; because there were many Powers in the world, with regard to which we have no diplomatic relations whatever. Mr. C. anticipated the suggestion he perceived his friend was about to make, that, the South American provinces having been once a part of Spain, there was in that circumstance an exception to the general rule. In reply to that argument, Mr. C. said, that whilst the power of Napoleon was at its extent, it had stretched over and absorbed in his empire many Powers to which the act of 1794 would have previously applied—Powers in the heart of Germany; several Powers there were from whom we had never received a Minister—among others, that of Murat, to whose late Government we have recently sent a Minister on one of those fruitless errands on which we too often send Ministers, &c.—[Mr. C. here gave way for an explanation by Mr. TUCKER, and then proceeded.] With regard to the case which had lately arisen in the Circuit Court of the United States at Boston, Mr. C. remarked, that he had heard from Judge Story himself, that he had entertained no doubt of the legality of the commission; but, as other questions had arisen in regard to which there was a difference of opinion between the judges, they had chosen to introduce that question into the case, to bring it before the Supreme Court. After some further remarks,

Mr. C. said it would be time enough to amend the act of 1794 after a decision against its competency to the present state of things by the Supreme Court of the country, to whom the Agent of His Majesty Ferdinand VII. knows very well how to go. The President had placed the parties to the war on an equal footing: if they were equal for one object, they were for another—and, being equal in our ports, and equally entitled to the rights of belligerents, they must be placed on an equal footing in our courts.

The honorable gentleman from Maryland had discovered, however, that we have no claim for territory against Spain. [Mr. SMITH explained, that he had said we have possession of all we claim, and it is Spain who disputes that point with us.] When, Mr. C. asked, did we take possession to the Rio del Norte? he believed there was an immense tract of country extending westwardly to that river which we were not in possession of. Although Congress had been told of an order given to suppress the establishment at Galveston, to this day not even a movement had been made by the United States to that quarter of the country. But, it seems, said Mr. C., that we have nothing but spoliation to complain of on the part of Spain. When did the honorable gentleman discover this? When was that gross insult on the American flag, committed in the case of the Firebrand, on the Gulf of Mexico, repaired? When was the insult on the flag of the United States in the case of the frigate Essex in the Gulf of Valparaiso atoned for? Let not the gentleman escape from that by saying that the patriot flag was flying there; for Spain is responsible for all acts committed on territory she claims—for, Mr. C. said, he had no idea of this modern doctrine of inability on the part of Spain to prevent the wrongs which we are therefore to submit to from her territory. We have suffered enough, God knows, Mr. C. said, from all the Powers of Europe; but on the subject of this contest with Spain, he thought there was a sensitive delicacy displayed not often felt. He would, he said, prevent our citizens from committing depredations on her commerce; but he had no idea of succumbing to every little potentate in Europe, the King of Naples, for instance, because in the course of the existing war some little injury might be done to our commerce. Recognise the independence of the patriots, said Mr. C., and they will do you justice in this respect. In regard to the independence of the Southern Republics, Mr. C. said, that Buenos Ayres had not only declared but had maintained her independence; and, acknowledged or not, was as independent as any Power in America. Venezuela and Chili had also declared their independence. Although in the war now raging, some little injury might have been sustained by our commerce, yet, as far as his information extended, less injury had been done to it in the present war than in almost any other which as neutrals we have witnessed. He appealed to his honorable friend from Louisiana—and it would be recollected that New Orleans was one of the most suspected cities—what had been the official report of the attorney for that district? Why, that, after the most careful inquiry, he could find no instance of such offences as were charged. The fact was, Mr. C. said, he believed, with regard to these depredations, that some of the merchants engaged in the Lima trade, under the favor of the Spanish Government, disliked the interference of the patriots; and that the act of 1817 was not so much necessary to protect our commerce as the enterprises of those who enjoyed a valuable trade with the Royal authorities, and were afraid lest the patriot flag might capture and condemn their vessels.

Mr. C. concluded his remarks by saying that the act of 1794 was all sufficient for every necessary purpose, connected with our neutral attitude; but, after any decision to the contrary by the highest tribunal of the country, he would go along with gentlemen and make it applicable. But with regard to the bond and security required by the law of 1817, at the discretion of every petty collector, urged on by the Spanish agents throughout the country, he hoped to see the law containing that provision expunged from the statute book.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, replied to Mr. CLAY. There was no nation on earth, he said, whose interests required from it a fair and honorable conduct as a neutral, so much as this. Britain alone had a more extensive commerce than us; but with it had a larger marine, and was not so much bound to delicacy in its neutral deportment. We should from this consideration be careful how we relax our measures calculated to enforce it. As to the case of the Eagle, Mr. S. said the Speaker was right as to facts. But, if the law of 1817 had existed, the collector would have kept clear of that difficulty. As to the distinction taken between St. Domingo and the Spanish provinces, Mr. S. said that the flag of the former is admitted onto our ports, in the same manner as the flag of any other country. With respect to our controversy with Spain, Mr. S. went on to say, he had not expected from the Speaker the remarks he had made. I know very well, said he, that we claim to the Rio del Norte. We have always avowed and held that claim; and, if we have not actual possession farther than the Sabine, it is because we are not ready to go beyond it. We hold the right, and occupy the soil as far as we find it agreeable to do so. Consequently our claims on Spain are for spoiliations only. As to the case of the Firebrand, if proper explanations had not been made on that transaction, there was no doubt the President would have resented it as he ought, and that the nation would have known of it. As to the scene which occurred at Valparaiso, though the patriot flag was flying there, it appeared that Spain must be considered responsible for that. Had the Executive ever complained to Spain of that act? If it had, he had never heard of it—and he presumed it would not have been overlooked if it could be properly charged to her account. With regard to the plea of inability, to prevent violations of our rights from her territory, the Executive had acted on the ground taken by the Speaker, in taking possession of Amelia Island. That position having become a resort for smugglers and buccaneers, it was incumbent on the Executive to put them aside, and he had done it. He was glad that, on this point at least, the honorable Speaker agreed with him. [Not at all, not at all, said Mr. CLAY.]

As to the occurrences of the war, Mr. S. said we had some reasons to complain of the manner in which it had been carried on, on the part of the patriots. One of the causes of the war we lately waged with Great Britain, was the system of paper blockades. By the laws of the United States, and the proclamation of Spain, permitting the trade to all neutrals, a trade was open to us from the Rio del Norte to Mexico—and had been very beneficially carried on for a number of years. But Admiral Brion, a patriot commander, had undertaken, by a paper blockade, to forbid trade to a coast two thousand miles in extent, and our vessels daring to trade there were thus subjected to capture—the consequence of which was, that nobody attempted it; the trade is given up.

Something had fallen from the Speaker, in the course of his remarks, which might produce an impression, doubtless not intended by him, that there was something in the act of 1817 which forbade the exportation of munitions of war. Nothing of the kind, said Mr. S.: on the contrary, our vessels constantly load and go to Buenos Ayres, to Chili, to Oronoke, &c., and there is no obstruction whatever in their way on our statute book. We know that contraband of war, bound to one belligerent, is liable to capture by another, and we run the risk; but our laws never have forbidden that trade. While ever a trade is open, the merchants of the United States will pursue it, whether it be to ports of Spain or of the patriots; if the merchants think it a fair trade, they will pursue it. And yet the Speaker is offended because we pursue a little trade to the Spanish colonies. If the ideas of the Speaker are to prevail, said Mr. S., that, because our affections are with the opposite party, we shall not trade with Spain, what would now be the price of flour? Instead of ten dollars per barrel, it would be some five or six. The port of Havana alone, Mr. S. said, took one-sixth of the whole of the flour shipped from the United States for foreign consumption. Previous to the French Revolution, it had been circuitously supplied by the produce of this country; but from fifteen to twenty years that port, one of the most important in the world, had been open to us. And, Mr. S. asked, was it a crime to trade there? It is no crime to trade wherever the laws of the country permit; it is not only no crime, but it is honorable and useful to the country to open a new trade to any quarter; and he trusted it would not be long before we should have another trade open equally beneficial as any we have heretofore possessed, &c. Mr. S. concluded by some general remarks on the state of trade, which he thought as good as we had any reason to expect after the general peace in Europe.

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

A division of the question having been called on Mr. CLAY's motion, the question was taken on so much of it as proposes, in effect, to repeal the act of 1797, and decided in the negative. For the amendment 67, against it 79.

Mr. CLAY then withdrew the remainder of his proposed amendment, under the impression that this vote indicated the opinion that the act of 1794 did not apply to the existing war; and moved an amendment, the effect of which was to repeal the act of 1797, and the second and third sections of the act of 1817.

After some remarks between Mr. FORSYTH and Mr. CLAY, against and for the motion—

The question was taken thereon, and decided in the negative. For the amendment 63, against it 65.

Mr. CLAY, then, understanding these votes as evidence of the sense of the House that, until the Southern independent governments were recognised by the United States, they could not be by our courts, and therefore that commissions issued by those governments would be deemed unlawful, rose to move an amendment, going to place the Patriot governments, in fact, on the footing of equality, on which it was the declared wish of the Executive to place them. At present the Executive receives their flags; but if, when they come into the United States, those sailing under them were liable to be prosecuted as pirates, this injustice should be obviated. Such was the object, he said, of the amendment which he moved to add to the bill as a new section, to this effect:

"That neither the persons nor the property of persons sailing under the flag of any colony, district, or people, in amity with the United States, should be subject to the penalties attached to piracy in the courts of the United States, for or on account of the Government of the United States having omitted to acknowledge the sovereignty and independence of such colony, district, or people."

It being late in the day, the Committee then rose and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 19.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Frederick Brown; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the same committee, reported, without amendment, the bill from the Senate, extending the time for obtaining military land warrants, and for other purposes; which bill was ordered to a third reading to-day, and read a third time accordingly, and passed.

Mr. TAYLOR submitted a joint resolution, authorizing the transportation by mail, free of postage, by the members of Congress, of the documents lately communicated by the President, respecting our relations with Spain.

The resolution was twice read, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-day, and subsequently read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SPENCER, the Secretary of State was directed to inform this House, whether a distribution has been made of the journals and documents published under the order of the Senate and House of Representatives, respectively, pursuant to the joint resolution of the 27th of December, 1813, and what further provision is necessary to insure the transmission of the said journals and documents, according to the said resolution.

Mr. SPENCER submitted the following resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That, unless otherwise specially directed by the House, six hundred copies shall be struck off all such matters as may be directed to be printed, except bills and amendments.

That the said six hundred copies shall be disposed of, and distributed in the following manner, to wit:

Two hundred copies shall be retained in the printing office, and at the close of each session be disposed of and distributed, conformably with the provisions of the resolution of the 27th of Dec., 1813. 200

The remaining four hundred copies shall be deposited by the printer in the post-office of the House, from time to time, as the work may be executed, pursuant to his contract, and shall be promptly distributed by the Doorkeeper of the House, as follows, to wit:

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit:

1. An act to adjust the claims to lots in the town of Vincennes, and for the sale of the land appropriated as a common for the use of the inhabitants of the said town.

2. An act for the relief of John Small.

3. An act respecting the surveying and sale of the public lands in the Alabama Territory.

4. An act to defray the expenses of the militia, when marching to places of rendezvous.

5. An act for the relief of Ashael Clark.

6. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to repay or remit certain alien duties therein described; in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

The first and third mentioned of the said bills were, respectively, read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The second mentioned of the said bills was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The fourth mentioned of the said bills was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The fifth mentioned of the said bills was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The last mentioned of the said bills was read twice, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The resolution from the Senate, "directing the distribution of the laws of the fourteenth Congress among the members of the fifteenth Congress" was read the third time, and passed as amended.

THE NEUTRALITY BILL.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill in addition to the "Act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned." Mr. CLAY's motion to add a section exempting vessels sailing under the flags of unrecognized governments entering our ports, from the penalties of piracy, being still under consideration.

Mr. CLAY declined taking up the time of the Committee any further on this motion. He would only say, that his object was to place the Patriot flag on precisely the same footing in our ports, as that of the opposite party. He disclaimed any intention, as he learned was presumed by some, of producing by this motion an indirect recognition of South American independence. Whenever he should bring that question before the House, as he assuredly meant to do, it would be in a way open, direct, and unambiguous.

Mr. FORSYTH opposed the motion, and entered into various arguments to show the impropriety of placing upon this footing the flags of governments purporting to be organized and independent, which might have no existence, and to whom there could be no appeal for the misconduct of those acting under commissions from their pretended authority. As an example, he mentioned the Mexican Patriot Government, of whose Congress we had some time ago heard, and which, it had been reported last year, had passed a vote of thanks to the honorable Speaker for his magnanimous exertions in favor of their cause; but this Congress had sunk into oblivion, and all semblance of an independent government become extinct, since the fall of the unfortunate Mina; also that of Venezuela, whose government existed only in the camp of Bolivar. To these governments there could be no resort, as they could not be found, and therefore could not be considered responsible, though there were numerous cruisers sailing under commissions issued by them, which might commit any irregularity, and even depredate upon American property, without our being able to appeal to those granting the commissions for redress.

Mr. CLAY offered a few more remarks in favor of an amendment, whose objects he thought so clear and proper. As to the vote of thanks which it was said he had received from the Mexican Congress, he had no knowledge of it; but of such a distinction, if it were so, he should feel proud. If, however, said Mr. C., I have deserved such an honor from the patriots for my exertions, I submit it to my friend from Georgia, whether he does not deserve a vote of thanks from the opposite party, for his exertions on that side?

Mr. T. M. NELSON replied to Mr. FORSYTH, and disclaimed any views in the votes which he gave here, other than the good of his country and mankind. He was unwilling to involve his country in war to benefit any people or Government, but he would not, from any apprehension of war, be deterred from doing equal justice, and particularly when his feelings as a republican, a philanthropist, and a christian, impelled him to wish success to every struggle for liberty, such a struggle, as he believed, was now going on in South America. Mr. N. said, the amendment proposed would involve the United States in no quarrel; it simply called for the practice of the impartial neutrality which was professed. It would not have the effect of screening from punishment depredations on American property, as Mr. FORSYTH had apprehended; it would merely not make the punishment depend on the acknowledgment of sovereignty. The persons and property coming into our ports under the Spanish flag, were not liable to punishment in our courts, and it was not impartial that those sailing under the flag of the South American patriots should be, only because their independence remained unacknowledged by our Government. The people of this country, Mr. N. believed, were not willing to make so flagrant a difference in favor of a Government alike intolerant to the claims of humanity towards its colonies, and regardless of the claims of justice made on it by the United States. He hoped the amendment would be agreed to.

Mr. MIDDLETON spoke as to the reputed fact in the trial of a case of capture adjudicated in the district court of South Carolina, referred to in the debate.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, spoke, to show that the amendment was not necessary to the correct adjudication of cases coming before the courts under the law.

Mr. LOWNDES had no objection to the object of the amendment, but spoke some time to show that it was not sufficiently definite. It would be a monstrous injustice to subject to punishment individuals making captures and bringing them into our ports, under the flags of Governments so well established as some of the South American States—that of Buenos Ayres, for instance; but the words of the amendment would admit vessels under any flag, even such as that of a few individuals who should assemble on the obscure island of Juan Fernandez, and fit out their cruisers. It could not be the intention of the House to permit captured property to be brought into our ports, and their legality sanctioned under such authority. In these cases there ought to be either an individual or a national responsibility; in the obscure and unknown establishments to which he had alluded, this responsibility could not be national; then the responsibility ought to apply to the individual. It was said, the amendment was to apply to such flags as were admitted by the Executive, and not to such as were excluded by the Executive; Mr. L. denied that the Executive had the power, either by the Constitution or by law, to exclude any flag from our ports—that power was vested in Congress alone. The amendment would, therefore, recognise the flag of any country, however ephemeral, and thus go to destroy that individual responsibility for crimes, in our courts, which ought not to be relinquished.

Mr. CLAY had no objection to any modification of his motion, which should limit its application to the independent States of South America, and he should have inserted such words himself, had he not deemed it expedient to adopt the precise language of the law of last session, in which there was no designation of any particular States. He differed, however, from Mr. LOWNDES, as to the power of the Executive to exclude any flag—he believed the President had that power; but, to settle that question, he had no objection to confer that power by the law, and let him decide what flags should be admitted, and thus come under the amendment.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, moved to modify the amendment to read as follows. It would not change the effect at all, but only the language; and, if adopted, it would be competent for the courts to say whether any flag in question was that of a colony, district, or people, within the meaning of the section:

"And be it further enacted, That in prosecutions either against persons or property, sailing under the flag of any colony, district, or people, which shall be admitted into the ports of the United States, it shall not be deemed ground for the punishment or condemnation of such person or property, that the sovereignty of such colony, district, or people, has not been acknowledged by the Government of the United States."

This modification was accepted by Mr. CLAY, (and assented to by Mr. LOWNDES,) as a substitute for his motion.

It was opposed, in this shape, by Messrs. FORSYTH and SMITH, of Maryland, and supported by Mr. TUCKER. Mr. SPENCER submitted some remarks in reply to Mr. SMITH, on the nature of piracy, which could be committed with as well as without a commission, &c.

The question was then taken on Mr. CLAY's amendment, as modified, and carried—ayes 87.

Mr. FORSYTH then said, the adoption of this section went to authorize every colony, district, or people whatsoever, to issue commissions, and to recognise such commissions in our ports. He wished that the section might be confined to responsible Governments, and not recognise any handful of men who might embody and issue commissions to capture property on the high seas. He, therefore, moved to add to the section the following proviso:

"Provided, That the colony, district, or people aforesaid, have organized an existing independent Government at the time of the commission of the fact of which the persons are charged."

Mr. CLAY, after waiving the objection of order which might be made to this motion, said it was improper, because it would require too much. Venezuela, for example, which had achieved an imperishable fame by its noble and unparalleled exertions in the cause of liberty—he did not know that this State was actually independent, though it so well deserved to be, and had no doubt it would soon be—yet the flag of this Government, so much entitled to our respect and admiration, would be excluded from our ports by the proviso.

On motion of Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, the proviso was amended, to read as follows—ayes 85:

"Provided, That the colony, district, or people aforesaid, have organized an existing Government, claiming to be independent at the time of the commission of the fact, of which the persons are charged."

Mr. FORSYTH moved to insert the word "responsible," after the word "existing."

Mr. CLAY objected to this, as a phrase vague and unusual, applied to a nation, however definite and intelligible applied to an individual. What was a responsible Government? Some might think the Government of Spain itself, of the adored Ferdinand, not responsible. It was a term of too doubtful construction to be proper here.

Mr. FORSYTH said, the word responsible was of definite and precise meaning, as applied to nations or individuals. There was a pecuniary responsibility certainly, but the Speaker understood perfectly well there were other responsibilities, too, with respect to nations. His wish was to permit the courts to judge whether the Government, claiming to be independent, was so constituted as to enable the United States to make it answerable for the conduct of those sailing under its commission. Before the end of the present session of Congress, he hoped to be permitted to show to the Speaker how the adored Ferdinand might be made responsible for the conduct of Spain to the United States.

Mr. CLAY expressed his thanks for this information, and the pleasure it gave him.

Mr. FORSYTH's motion was lost, and the proviso was then agreed to, as modified by Mr. TUCKER.

The Committee then rose, and reported the bill and amendments to the House; which were laid on the table, to be printed.

OHIO CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Elections, in the case of the disputed right of Mr. HERRICK to his seat, in consequence of having for some time after his election held the office of United States Attorney for the district of Ohio. The report concludes with a resolution that Mr. H. is entitled to a seat; which resolution Mr. Adams yesterday moved to reverse.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kentucky, said that his reflections on this subject had produced a result, very different from the resolution recommended by the Committee of Elections. The question presented by the report is a very important one; and the delicacy, if not the difficulty, of the subject is very much increased by the consideration, that, not only the seats of several gentlemen here, but the rights of their constituents are involved. If we shall, by any incorrect decision, declare that these seats are vacant, we shall, indeed, deeply injure that portion of our fellow-citizens whose power we destroy, and whose voice we silence in this House; but this consideration can only prompt us to a more attentive examination of the subject, when it is remembered that, if we admit to the councils of the country persons who have not the required qualifications, we inflict a much greater injury on the whole body of the American people. There is nothing more highly calculated to excite the jealousy of freemen, than an extension of the power of legislating over them, to those to whom they have not imparted it.

The duty which we are now performing is important, but fortunately of rare occurrence. This House has now laid aside its ordinary legislative character, and has assumed, under the direction of the Constitution, the functions and powers of a court. The solitary case in which the House of Representatives assumes the judicial character is, in determining "the election returns and qualifications of its own members." The ultimate consistency of all its other acts with the Constitution is to be tested by another department. In this case it is the sole judge of the facts and the Constitution. Its exposition is final and uncontrollable. This consideration impresses on us the importance of the question, and shows the necessity of giving to it the clearest examination. And, however strong our personal feeling might be to wish the most intimate association with these gentlemen in the discharge of our duties, however much we might rejoice that the nation should receive the benefit of their experience and talents, it must be remembered that we can neither extend nor curtail the demanded qualification. It is known that he must rely on the last member of the sixth section of the Constitution for the exclusion, which he expected to establish, which declares that "no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office." The question seems to depend, by unanimous concession, on the time at which the representative character was assumed. Was it on the 4th of March; or at the time of taking the seat, or oath; or at what time was it? To maintain the position for which he contended, it must be established that the individual became a representative on the 4th day of March, the commencement of the Congressional term. But it has been contended in the answer of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that this period has no other claim to dignity than that which an ordinary act of the legislature could give it, and that, consequently, in giving construction to the Constitution, we could not assume that time, in preference to any other, as the beginning of the term. If the fact corresponded with this statement, the consequence contended for could not follow, as the statute would have been in necessary execution of the Constitution, and as indispensable for putting the Government into operation as any clause in the original instrument. But, by attending to the facts as they occurred, it will be manifest that the period here assumed, is the commencement of the federal year, and that nothing has been fixed with more solemnity. The body of the Constitution does not, and indeed could not, from the uncertainty of its ever being ratified, declare the day on which the Government should take effect. But, on the same day on which the Constitution was completed, the Convention still sitting in its public character, with all the powers with which they ever had been invested, passed a resolution, in which the mode of procuring the assent and ratification of the States was prescribed, and authority was given to the Old Congress, "as soon as the Conventions of nine States had ratified this Constitution, to fix a time and place for commencing 'proceedings under this Constitution.'" It was further resolved that, after the requisite elections had taken place, all of which were therein provided for, that "the Senators and Representatives should convene at the time and place assigned," and that "the Congress, together with the President, should, without delay, proceed to execute this Constitution." This resolution was declared to have been passed "by the unanimous order of the Convention;" and was attested by the President and Secretary. It will readily be conceded that, if the members of the Convention possessed the power of framing a Constitution, they as certainly possessed the means of providing for its execution. The time for beginning the new order was of necessity submitted to some body, which should have existence when the ratifications of the several States should be received. And these resolutions had in truth, and in public estimation too, as much dignity as any part of the body of the instrument, for all the States in the Union recognised them by appointing Conventions, and Congress did discharge the duty vested in them. On the 13th September, 1788, information having been received of the ratification according to the required manner, Congress executed the power, by resolving that "the first Wednesday in March next be the time, and the present Seat of Congress the place,* for commencing proceedings under the Constitution." And the Senators and Representatives did give final execution to the original resolution by meeting on that day. The journal is entered in the first volume of the late edition of the laws of the United States, and contains the narrative of these proceedings. The first act of the Senate has precluded all question as it regards that body, as, in obedience to the third section, the Senators were at their first meeting divided into three classes, and the seats of each declared vacant at the expiration of two, four, and six years respectively, all in reference to that day.

Mr. A. said he should not have devoted one moment to prove what he never knew before to be denied, if it had not been seriously urged in the answer, that this day had been assumed as the commencement of the Congressional year, only by an act of ordinary legislation, and that, in any debate on the construction of the Constitution, it had no more claim to attention than any other period of time. But it now must be manifest that this day has been fixed with a certainty and solemnity which would forbid the Legislature from declaring that Congress should in future take its date from any other period; and, indeed, forbid it from all interference on the subject.

In examining this subject, Mr. A. said, he should not pursue the course of the report, but should take the Constitution solely as his guide, and expected to prove, from its various provisions, that the individual elected assumes the character, privileges, and responsibilities of a member before the session of Congress; or, in other words, that they are not dependent on his taking the oath, and the actual occupation of his seat. The first part to which he called the attention of the Committee was the first member of the fifth section, which declares that "a majority of each House shall constitute a quorum to do business, but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members." There is no pretence for saying that this has not reference to the first as well as to any subsequent session of Congress. Here, then, is the plainest evidence that a person elected may be a member of the House before he has appeared and taken his seat; before he has presented himself to the House; before he has given any formal acknowledgment of its authority; even before he has given the least signification of his acceptance, there is imposed on him the responsibility of a member. He is bound to attend; and his disobedience would be punished by adequate penalties. The operation of this clause may seem highly penal; it may seem harsh to impose such obligations on a citizen who has manifested no unwillingness to incur them. That the language of the section is plain, would be an ample answer to any complaint of supposed hardships; but it is evident that the grant of such a power was essential to keep alive the two Houses of Congress. It would have been idle to have created a legislative body, without giving to the attending members the power of coercing the attention of absentees, and thereby of preserving its own existence. But this could be done in no way but by imposing on the persons elected the character and obligations of members.

This section, then, completely establishes the position, that persons elected may be Senators or Representatives before their appearance. To what period of time, then, can the beginning of their public character be referred? To none but the commencement of the term. If Congress had been convened on the 1st of June, the same power would have been possessed to compel the attendance of those who were absent; and such would have been the case at any meeting after the 3d of March. Hence, to his mind the consequence was resistless, that if the individual has been chosen by the people, and the time has commenced, he is a member, and is subject to all the penalties and disabilities of one. It has been thought by some, that the person elected could not be a Representative unless he had given some formal evidence of his acceptance; but this section entirely destroys that idea. So far from requiring any formal acceptance of the votes of the people, to subject him to the call of the House, we see that even a failure to attend is not considered sufficient evidence of non-acceptance as to rescue him from its power. The clear inference, then, is, that when an individual of the requisite age and citizenship has been elected, he is a member, unless he gives positive evidence that he refuses to accept. And it is not believed that any inconvenience can result from this section, so necessary to the existence of Congress, as the cases have never yet been disclosed in which the votes of the people were thrown upon a gentleman, unless it was with his acquiescence, and, generally, at his most earnest entreaty; and no mischief can in any way arise, as the person may easily release himself from the pains by renouncing the honors of a Representative.

Before he proceeded to test the construction contended for by his adversaries, by the other provisions of the Constitution, it was necessary that he should examine a position assumed by them, and urged with great confidence, one which was rejected by the Committee of Elections, but seemed to be relied upon as the main ground of defence in the printed answers of the gentlemen from Massachusetts and Ohio, (Messrs. HOLMES and HERRICK.) They rested their defence to a seat in this House on the distinction between the words "representatives and members." The clause which produces the exclusion in this case says, that "no person holding an office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office." And the whole course of the argument of these gentlemen is founded on the admission that they were representatives from the commencement of the term; but they contend that they were not members until the oath was administered, and the House was organized, and, of course, were not embraced within the exclusion. For this construction they have contended with such zeal, as to demonstrate that in their opinion the whole question turns on this point. To ascertain the correctness of this bold and novel idea, he had imposed on himself the trouble of a verbal and critical examination of the whole Constitution; and he now felt the confident conviction that it was not correct. The word "members" is used in various places to convey the same meaning which is expressed by the words "senators and representatives;" they are used indiscriminately throughout the Constitution. The clause on which he had commented spoke particularly of members in reference to a time before they had appeared, and before the House was convened; it gave the power of calling the "absent members" to produce an organization of the House, the very fact which these gentlemen contend is necessary to constitute a member. But it is used, generally, to prevent circumlocution, as a collective word, embracing the constituent individuals of both Houses. Wherever a section is introduced in the Constitution, giving powers, or imposing duties on the members of both Houses, that word is used to supersede the necessity of two sections, which would have been otherwise necessary. It would not only have been prolix, but very inelegant to have prescribed the powers and duties of the Senators, and, immediately afterwards, to have introduced a section, similar in all respects, declaring the powers and duties of Representatives. This prolixity and inelegance has been avoided by the use of a word equally applicable to both. But so strong was the reliance which had been placed in this construction, that he had been induced to examine the letters of the Federalist, to ascertain whether it was rendered plausible by any notice or commentary there; but he found that in the work the word "members" had been employed in more than twenty cases, in reference to the persons elected, before the meeting of the Congress for which they had been elected. In one remarkable instance, in the case of the clause now under consideration, the authors, in stating the operation of it for another purpose, say that the "Senators and Representatives" are excluded from office, thereby substituting those words for the one which is really used, showing most clearly that they considered them as synonymous, and that the distinction now urged was not suggested to them. It may be said, as this question did not form the particular subject of consideration in any of these celebrated tracts, that no definition there imposed should have the weight of an authority. He said he did not use it for the authority of their opinion, but he used it for the authority of the fact, that it was impossible, if the distinction between these words, as now contended for, had been taken in the Convention, that Mr. Madison and Mr. Hamilton, who took an active part in all its proceedings, should so soon have forgotten it; should so soon afterwards have used, as synonymous, words between which they had, a few months before, created such an important difference. He said he could not have much confidence in a construction which had not occurred to any one for nearly thirty years. He asked the whole Committee, he asked each member individually, if the thought had ever occurred to him that he was a Representative from the commencement of the term, but not a member of Congress until the House was organized? The idea was, then, surely fallacious, and the authors of it entitled to nothing but the high merit of ingenuity and novelty.

Ohio Contested Election.

The sixth section, which declares that "Senators and Representatives shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same," furnishes a case, in which the privileges of a Representative are thrown over the individual before he takes the oath of office. This exemption precedes the very facts which, the report contends, are necessary to constitute the Representative.

In perfect coincidence with these two clauses is the first section, article second, which, prescribing the manner of appointing a President, says that "no Senator or Representative, or person holding any office under the United States, shall be appointed an elector." This sentence surely embraces the case of a Representative, as well before as after he has taken his seat. The reason of the exclusion is plain, and we should deprive the clause of half its operation, if it was restricted to the period which occurs after the member has taken his seat. But notwithstanding this interdiction, if the construction of the report be correct, a member of Congress may, before the session commences, act as an elector. Surely we should not rashly admit a construction which would enable all who have been elected to Congress to serve as electors during that whole period of time between March and December; but this result must follow, if the person elected is not a Representative until he appears and takes his seat, for it is the Representative only who is the disqualified person; and if that character has not attached itself to him he is under no disqualification, and can be an elector. One reason which caused the Convention to disqualify members of Congress from serving as electors was, that, in the event of an equal number of votes between any two candidates for the Presidency, the President is to be chosen by the House of Representatives. That the same individual, then, may act and vote as an elector, and in a few weeks afterwards, in the event of a tie, may, on this floor, again vote for the President, is the preposterous and frightful, but certain consequence of the gentlemen's doctrine. If we assent to the position assumed, there is no mode of extricating ourselves from the difficulty; but if we were only reduced to the alternative of ascribing these consequences to the Constitution, or to the report, the gentlemen must pardon him if he thought they were entitled to the preference.

The second section of Art. 1 says that no person shall be "a Representative who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years, and have been seven years a citizen of the United States." If the idea is correct that no one can be a Representative before the oath is taken, then this requisition is complied with, if the age and citizenship be attained at any time before the meeting of Congress. This may seem at first reasonable enough, as there is no official duty to be performed in which wisdom or experience is required before that time; but the consequence would be ludicrous, as it makes the eligibility of the person chosen depend on the time of year at which Congress meets. If Congress is convened in the Spring, he is not eligible; if it is postponed until December, the age is obtained and he takes his seat.

The farther result follows, that in this way you give to the President the power of conferring or withholding the eligibility of the individual, as he can, by convening Congress at an earlier day than the usual one, deprive him of the qualification which he would have attained in a few months. Unless, indeed, you push the consequence still farther, and contend that, as he is not a Representative until he is sworn, he may postpone that period, and be still eligible and take his seat, if he attains the required age at any time before the expiration of the term. But certainly the qualifications of a member cannot depend on these various contingencies. The requisition must not rest on anything so uncertain as the meeting of Congress or the will of the President. His opinion was, that the person elected must be qualified to serve on the 4th day of March—the day on which he is liable to be called.

It must now be obvious that this case comes within the letter of the Constitution; and he would not very readily assent to a doctrine which would support the idea that we should disregard a case which was plainly within the language of the rule, merely because we did not see the reasons of its introduction. We expound the rule, but cannot extend or restrict it. We bear the same relation to the Constitution which the Judiciary does to the statute. A judge cannot refuse to give effect to a law because he cannot discover, or, if he discovers, does not approve the reasons of its enactment. But here the letter so strictly corresponded with the intention of the Convention, that he readily submitted his construction to this favorite test.

It has been said in the report, without any qualification, that there was no reason for his exposition; that, as the office must be resigned before the seat was taken, no mischief could arise from permitting the individual to hold the office after his election, until the meeting of Congress. So strong was his conviction of its fallacy, that on it he would rest the question.

From the language of the Constitution and the order of its arrangement, it is manifest that the framers had a general design of separating the powers of government. This general design was, however, violated in several excepted cases, in some of which the powers of two departments were vested in the same person, and in others, those of one divided between two. Every rule, however, on this subject, directs us to give a construction which would promote the general rule in preference to one which would extend the exception. It is probable that the idea held out in the report, that no mischief could flow from its construction, arises from the fact, that those who have examined the subject have attended exclusively to the Representative; and when they have failed in discovering any bias which could influence his legislative acts after his office was laid aside, saw no reason for a different opinion. But if they will for a moment cast their thoughts towards the President, at whose will this office has been held since March, reflect on the inducement which might influence him to retain the favor of this officer, who is a member of Congress; recollect, farther, that this officer is a member of the only tribunal which can bring the President to punishment, and you would see ample reason for his construction. Is there not a most powerful motive on the President to refrain from dismissing that man from office who he knows will be an influential member of the House of Representatives, the only body which can ever bring him to a trial? Will a President dare to displace that officer, whatever be his negligence or infamy, who in a few months will be in a seat, in which he can expose his misdeeds or move his impeachment? It was intended that the Chief Magistrate should have the most perfect independence, not only in appointing, but in retaining officers in the public service; but here we defeat the object, by exposing him to the strongest temptation to retain an incompetent officer. The Constitutional independence of the President is commuted for a corrupt and illegal dependence on the creature of his own will. Reflect on the incongruous state of things which you produce, when an individual is, in one character, the tenant of an office at the will of the President, and in his other, his prosecutor, if in this House, or his judge if in the Senate. I will propound to you, Mr. Chairman, said Mr. A., the simplest question, which will show the feelings and the conduct of any man: If you had an important suit now depending in the Supreme Court, and one of the Judges held a profitable private agency at your disposal, dare you to displace him before that suit was tried? And if you had firmness to dare, would he have virtue enough not to remember it? If you adopt my construction, we shall neither expose you or the judge to such temptation.

But the strongest view of this mischievous construction arises from the fact, that if a person can, after the 4th of March, hold his office and discharge new duties every day, he may be appointed to any new office, and still be eligible, if he resigns before the meeting of Congress. This consequence has not been and cannot be denied. In principle there is no difference between holding and discharging the duties of an officer after the election to which the individual has been previsibly appointed, and receiving a commission for any other, and performing its duties. No one has been so disingenuous as to attempt to show any distinction. By appointing an applicant for office who is in the next Congress, the President gains a friend and an advocate; by refusing, he makes an enemy; and do you not believe that he will always be preferred, who, in his application, can make the offer of his favor, or menace the Executive with his enmity, before one whose favor and enmity would be alike disregarded? With the multitude of offices in the Executive hands, it may safely be asserted that a corrupt President could never be brought to punishment. It is idle to expect that his patronage can ever be lessened in this country. His powers are at this moment in a most rapid state of accumulation, the inevitable consequence of our increasing wealth, population, and prosperity. And if ever you expect to decrease these powers, you must destroy the commerce of the ocean, you must lay waste the lands of the West, you must collect your revenue without officers, and create offices without salaries.

It may be said that the rewards which could be offered would be too small to operate as a bias, inasmuch as the utmost would be the possession of an office for a few months. But this cannot be urged with effect, as it would only show that the influence was not as great as might be in other cases; it is the existence, and not the degree of the influence which is regarded. An office of the emoluments of one hundred dollars, and of the duration of nine months, fills the language and the intention of the Constitution as completely as one of the emoluments of a million, or the duration of a life. In many cases, however, the profits of offices in the Executive gift, even for that period, were, as he believed gentlemen would be willing to admit, of some consideration. The salary of a foreign minister for nine months is nearly $7,000; of the Secretaries of the Departments, of some of the collectors of the ports, and many other officers, nearly $4,000; and of several hundred offices in the United States from one to three thousand dollars. All this is shown in the Red Book now on your table. These are sums which gentlemen, unless they valued money much less than he did, would be unwilling to surrender. No man who has been recently dismissed from office can come into this House without angry feelings towards that officer who dismissed him, and the President will always know this too well ever to produce them.

The report now before us shows that a state of things may easily occur, in which a timid President would fear to exercise his power of dismissal. In these tranquil times, when the Chief Magistrate of the nation receives the almost unanimous approbation of his countrymen, my apprehensions may not be realized; but if ever political conflict should come again, and parties be nearly equal in this House, would any President, but the one most strong in virtue, dare to dismiss from lucrative appointments as many as ten officers, who were soon to take their seats as members of Congress, and whom he thereby drew from the list of his adherents, and added to his enemies? He would not, however negligent or flagitious they might be. The observations which he had made applied with equal force to the Senate, as the seat of a Senator similarly situated depends on the same section. But when it is remembered that in all cases of the impeachment of a civil officer one-third of that body can produce an acquittal, we can readily see a strong inducement in the President to refrain from any injurious treatment towards a member of the Senate. So long as he can by his virtues or his vices secure fourteen Senators, he is beyond the control of the people or the power of punishment. May not, then, cases occur, in which the votes of one, two, or three men would be so important, as that they would be permitted to retain their offices, or new ones be given them after their election, with the sole view of securing their votes? It cannot be objected that it is unfair or unwise to argue from the supposition that a President is capable of corruption; the Constitution itself, which gives the power of impeachments, and contains various guards against the corrupt passions of man, warrants the idea. It would, indeed, be unpardonably puerile to act on the supposition, that the future officers of this Government would not have the same propensities and feelings which God had given to man since the creation of the world. If this argument only suited extreme cases he would at once surrender it; we must act for man as he is formed; we cannot fashion him by the standard of an angel.

In this way, too, the Constitutional sanction of the Senate would be evaded, as the President, by appointing an individual to office, who he knows will resign at the meeting of Congress, thereby increases his patronage by the necessity of another appointment, and multiplies the cases in which offices are held by individuals whose qualifications have not been tested by the Senate.

Other suggestions might be made on this subject which would tend to warrant my view; but, although considered singly, they would not, and probably ought not, to form the basis of an opinion, all conduce to the same end. In all cases of doubtful import, public sentiment and general practice cannot be wholly disregarded; he now referred to the laws of Congress, giving the privilege of franking letters, and an exemption from militia duty, and the practice under them. It is believed that a universal sentiment has prevailed that they attached to the member before he took his seat; and it would not be hazardous to venture a conjecture, that the enjoyment of them, in all the present cases, had not been postponed until the oath was administered. If it should be urged that this practice had been tolerated in silence, without objection or discussion, and of course was not entitled to the weight of an authority; he replied, that this circumstance gave the highest evidence of the universal opinion that it was right. There is no subject on which the people are so sensitive, none on which popular jealousy is so quick and lively, as in relation to exclusive privileges; and the least attempt on the part of a person elected to enjoy an exemption, before the laws gave it to him, would have excited immediate commotion and objection.

The President executes his authority very frequently of convening Congress before the ordinary time, and it is not believed that any difficulty has ever occurred about the address of his proclamation to the "Senators and Representatives," although they have never yet taken the oath, or given any formal evidence of acceptance. They have invariably obeyed the summons as they were bound to do, unless they resigned; under no other construction could the proclamation have any effect. If the Representative would not resign, and the obligations of a member were not imposed upon him so far as to make it his duty to obey the mandate, Congress could not be convened.

An opinion has been held by some, that the situation of these gentlemen, and that of a judge who had received the appointment of the President and Senate, but who had not yet taken the oath officio, were similar; and they contend that in neither was the appointment complete, nor could the official name and character attach themselves to the individual, until he had given this final evidence of acceptance and qualification. But, said Mr. A., this proposition is susceptible of answer, which he thought unanswerable. The present question depends solely on the verbal construction of the several parts of the Constitution which relate to it; and no argument can be drawn from any cases of supposed analogy, unless the language relating to the appointment be precisely similar. Whenever it was said that the person appointed did not become a judge until the oath of office was administered to him, with the view of drawing the same inference in relation to a Representative, he immediately demanded whether the language governing the cases were alike? But the language is essentially different, and all argument drawn from that source fails. The case of a Representative depended on different principles. The Constitution had, he thought, sufficiently declared that the election of the people did constitute the individual a member of Congress. And it would be observed that in all parts of the Constitution the analogy between Representatives and other officers was broken. The President, "before he enters on the execution of his office," must take the oath; but "Senators and Representatives shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution." Here the difference of phraseology shows to us that the oath required of the Representative was only one security provided against corruption, but was not considered as an act necessary to constitute the officer, or in any way necessary to give validity to his votes or acts. This construction commenced with the Government. It appears from the journals of the first Congress under the present Government, that the members did not take the oath until several weeks had elapsed after the beginning of the session, and not until they themselves had passed a law prescribing the manner in which it should be administered.

Mr. A. said that he believed that Congress was a continuing existing body. It is declared in the first line of the first section that "all legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States;" and he thought that lodgment never had been, nor ever would be, divested or suspended, until there was an entire violation of the Constitution, and consequent dissolution of the Government; that there has been a valid grant and divestiture of power from the people, and that there must be an existing and permanent deposit to receive them. The fourth section maintains this idea, and insures the continued existence of Congress; as, although the regulation of elections is in the first case submitted to the States, the power is reserved of altering them at any time, whereby it is impossible that there can be any chasm in the Legislature. If the States should ever show a disinclination to pass the necessary laws for holding elections, Congress would immediately exercise its power. But even if he were incorrect in this last opinion, it would not at all injure the main point, as he might be wholly wrong in this, and still, for the other reasons given, the report must be reversed.

When Mr. ANDERSON had concluded, Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, in a short speech, supported the right of the member to a seat.

Mr. FORSYTH spoke at some length in opposition to the report, and to the right of the member retaining his seat.

Mr. SPENCER replied, and spoke also at considerable length in support of the report, and the right of Mr. HERRICK to a seat.

Mr. FORSYTH rejoined, and further supported his opinion.

Mr. TAYLOR, Chairman of the Committee of Elections, entered at large into the defence of the report, and of the right of the member to a seat.

The Committee then rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, March 20.

The report was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Samson R. King, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which read twice, and committed.

On motion of Mr. SPEED, the Committee on the Public Lands were directed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the endorsement on each patent for military bounty land, the surveyor's description of the soil, timber, &c., of the lot conveyed by such patent.

On motion of Mr. SPENCER,

Resolved, That the same committee be directed to inquire into, and report to this House, the reason why the Register of the officers of the United States, has not been delivered to the members of this House.

Mr. SERGEANT submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be and he is hereby requested to lay before this House, if not inconsistent with the public interest, any communications made to the Department of State, relating to the occupation of Amelia Island, not heretofore communicated.

After an unsuccessful motion to lay the resolution on the table, and a good deal of discussion on the propriety of making this additional call on the Executive, the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ANDERSON, of Kentucky, the Committee on Roads, Canals, and Seminaries of Learning, were instructed to inquire into the propriety of authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to subscribe, on behalf of the United States, for five thousand shares in the capital stock of the Kentucky Ohio Canal Company.

OHIO CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House (having refused to take up the neutrality bill) again went into Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Elections respecting the right of Mr. HERRICK, a member from Ohio, to a seat in this House—Mr. ADAMS's motion to reverse the report, and thus vacate the seat, being under consideration.

Mr. TAYLOR concluded his remarks (which were interrupted by the adjournment yesterday) in favor of the report.

Mr. HOPKINSON took the opposite side, and spoke near an hour against the report of the Committee of Elections, and the right of the member to a seat.

Mr. BALDWIN spoke at considerable length in confirmation of the right of Mr. HERRICK to his seat.

Mr. ADAMS briefly replied; when the question was taken on reversing the report of the Committee of Elections, and carried—ayes 67, noes 66.

The Committee then rose, and reported their decision to the House.

After a good deal of desultory conversation on various motions, touching the right of certain members to vote on the question, whose seats were supposed to be held under circumstances similar to that of Mr. HERRICK, and therefore personally interested in the decision; and after refusing to excuse Messrs. BARBER, of Ohio, and HUBBARD, of New York, from voting, the question on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in reversing the report of the Committee of Elections, was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays. Those who voted for concurring with the Committee of the Whole, and, of course, against the right of the member to a seat, were:

Messrs. Abbott, Adams, Allen of Massachusetts, Anderson of Kentucky, Austin, Ball, Barbour of Virginia, Bateman, Bayley, Beecher, Bellinger, Bennett, Burwell, Claiborne, Cook, Crawford, Cushman, Darlington, Edwards, Ervin of South Carolina, Floyd, Forney, Forsyth, Garnett, Hogg, Holmes of Connecticut, Hopkinson, Huntington, Irving of New York, Johnson of Virginia, Little, Lowndes, McLane, Marr, Mason of Rhode Island, Middleton, Jeremiah Nelson, H. So the House refused to concur in the report of the Committee of the Whole; and then, after an unsuccessful motion by Mr. FORSYTH, to recommit the subject to the Committee of Elections, with instructions to report the case of Mr. HERRICK distinct from other cases now embraced in the report; and a motion, also unsuccessful, by Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, to postpone the report indefinitely—

The question was taken, by yeas and nays, on agreeing with the Committee of Elections, that Mr. HERRICK is entitled to a seat, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 77, nays 70, as follows:

SATURDAY, March 21.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to repay, or remit, certain alien duties therein described," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. SIMKINS, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing other land offices in the Territory of Alabama, than those already established, and of appointing other registers and receivers of public moneys, in addition to those already appointed.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for an earlier commencement of the next session of Congress than the stated period, with leave to report by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. TAYLOR, POINDEXTER, PITKIN, ROBERTSON of Kentucky, TUCKER of Virginia, RHEA, and WHITMAN, were appointed the committee.

Mr. BASSETT laid before the House a letter from Daniel Carroll, of Duddington, addressed to him as Chairman of the Committee on that part of the President's Message, in relation to the selection of the site for the Executive offices; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Elections, respecting the right of Elias Earle, a Representative from South Carolina, and George Mumford, a Representative from North Carolina, to seats in this House.

The Committee of the Whole, without debate, agreed to the report, and rose and reported their agreement to the House, and the House concurred with the Committee of the Whole in their agreement to the resolutions, that Mr. EARLE and Mr. MUMFORD are entitled to their seats, in which they are of course confirmed.

The following bills successively passed through Committees of the whole House, and were severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, to wit: A bill from the Senate for the relief of William Edwards and John G. Stubbs; a bill allowing additional salary and clerk hire to the surveyor of the Illinois and Missouri Territories, and for other purposes; a bill to extend the privilege of franking to the vaccine agents of States and Territories; a bill authorizing John Taylor to be placed on the navy pension fund.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the amendment reported by the Committee of Claims to the bill for the relief of John Bate. The Committee of the Whole concurred in the amendment.

A motion was then made by Mr. CLAIBORNE to amend the bill as amended, by striking out these words, to wit: "Also, to make such reduction in the rent, stipulated to be paid by the said John Bate, as shall appear just and equitable, in consequence of any deterioration in the quality, or diminution in the quantity of water in said saline, as may be proven to his satisfaction; as also."

Mr. MARR moved that the bill lie on the table. Negative.

The question was then taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. CLAIBORNE, and also negative. The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The amendments to the bill for the relief of Narcissus Broutin, were read, and concurred in by the House, and the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

The bill confirming the claim of Tobias Rheams to a tract of land, granted to him by the Spanish Government; and the bill for the relief of Daniel Burnett, Gibson Clark, and the legal representatives of Hubert Rowel, were ordered to be engrossed, and severally read a third time, on Monday next.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report on the petition of David Gelston, on behalf of himself and Peter A. Schenck; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

MONDAY, March 23.

The SPEAKER presented a petition of the Legislative Council, and House of Representatives, of the Territory of Alabama, praying to be invested with power to incorporate companies in said Territory, for the purpose of constructing turnpike roads, with exclusive privileges and right of toll.—Referred to the Committee appointed on Roads, Canals, and Seminaries of Learning.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Governor of the State of Pennsylvania, enclosing a return of the election of THOMAS J. ROGERS, a Representative from that State, in the place of John Ross, resigned; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, who was instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a Consulate at Mogadore, in the Empire of Morocco, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which were referred sundry petitions regarding duties paid to the United States, or claimed by them, on account of goods landed in the District of Castine, while it was in the possession of the British forces, and remaining there when its possession was restored to the Government of the United States; made a report thereon, which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. LITTLE, the Secretary of State was requested to lay before this House the cause of delay in printing the register of all officers and agents, civil, military, and naval, in the service of the United States, in conformity with the several resolutions of Congress, approved April 29, 1816.

On motion of Mr. LITTLE, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads were instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the privilege of franking to the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Mr. TAYLOR submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, &c., That after the close of each session of Congress, an alphabetical index of the acts and joint resolutions, passed at the preceding session, shall be prepared, printed, and distributed therewith, under the direction of the Secretary for the Department of State.

The resolution was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

Engrossed bills of the following titles to wit: An act authorizing John Taylor to be placed on the list of navy pensioners; an act for the relief of John Bate; an act confirming the claim of Tobias Rheams to a tract of land granted to him by the Spanish Government; an act for the relief of Daniel Burnett, Gibson Clarke, and the legal representatives of Hubert Rowel; and an act to extend the privilege of franking, to vaccine agents of States and Territories; were severally read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act confirming the claim of William Daniel, or his legal representatives, to a tract of land in the Mississippi Territory," was read the third time, and passed.

The House took up the bill for the relief of Narcissus Broutin, and others, and the same being further amended was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time, to-morrow.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims unfavorable to the petition of Edmund Brooke; and after a good deal of discussion, in which Mr. BARBOUR of Virginia earnestly opposed the report, it was agreed to by the Committee of the Whole, which then rose and reported their agreement to the House, which report was concurred in, and the prayer of the petitioner rejected.

NEUTRAL RELATIONS.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole, to the bill in addition to the act "to punish certain crimes against the United States," and to repeal the acts therein mentioned.

The amendments were successively agreed to, with the exception of the following, which was reported by the Committee as a 14th section to the bill, to wit:

"SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That in prosecutions either against persons or property, sailing under the flag of any colony, district, or people, which shall be admitted into the ports of the United States, it shall not be deemed a ground for the punishment or condemnation of such person or property, that the sovereignty of such colony, district, or people, has not been acknowledged by the United States: Provided, That the colony, district, or people, aforesaid, have an organized existing Government, claiming to be independent, at the time of the commission of the fact of which the persons are charged."

This amendment Mr. LOWNDES moved to amend by striking out the words "which shall be admitted into the ports of the United States," and to insert, in lieu thereof, "if such flag shall be directed to be admitted into the ports of the United States by instructions from the President of the United States to the several collectors of the customs, which instructions he is hereby authorized to issue."

This motion was negative, after considerable discussion; when

Mr. TUCKER moved to amend the section by striking out the words "which shall be admitted," and to insert, after "United States," the words "under the instructions of the President of the United States, to the several collectors of the customs."

Mr. LOWNDES then rose and moved that the bill and amendments be indefinitely postponed; which motion was decided in the negative—yeas 72, nays 79, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adams, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of Vermont, Baldwin, Barbour of Virginia, Bayley, Beecher, Bennett, Boss, Clagett, Cobb, Crafts, Cushman, Darlington, Earle, Edwards, Ervin of South Carolina, Folger, Forsyth, Hall of Delaware, Hall of North Carolina, Hitchcock, Holmes of Connecticut, Hopkinson, Hubbard, Hunter, Huntington, Lowndes, McLane, W. Mr. TUCKER's motion to amend the section was then agreed to; and

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the following proviso was added to the section: "Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect the rights of citizens of the United States, who may prosecute in the courts of the United States for property taken from them on the high seas;" after which, the section, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, moved to strike out the 10th and 11th sections of the bill, in the following words:

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the owners or consignees of every armed ship or vessel sailing out of the ports of the United States, belonging wholly or in part to the citizens thereof, shall enter into bond to the United States with sufficient sureties, prior to clearing out the same, in double the amount of the value of the vessel and cargo on board, including her armament, that the said ship or vessel shall not be employed by such owners to cruise or commit hostilities against the subjects, citizens, or property, of any foreign Prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are at peace.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the collectors of the customs be, and they are hereby, respectively authorized and required, to detain any vessel manifestly built for warlike purposes, and about to depart the United States, of which the cargo shall principally consist of arms and munitions of war; when the number of men shipped on board or other circumstances shall render it probable that such vessel is intended to be employed by the owner or owners to cruise or to commit hostilities upon the subjects, citizens, or property, of any foreign Prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are at peace, until the decision of the President be had thereon, or until the owner or owners shall give such bond and security as is required of the owners of armed ships by the preceding section of this act.

The question being divided, was first taken on striking out the tenth section, and decided in the negative—yeas 44, nays 95, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson of Pennsylvania, Anderson of Kentucky, Bellinger, Campbell, Claiborne, Comstock, Cruger, Culbreth, Desha, Earle, Floyd, Folger, Forney, Gage, Harrison, Herkimer, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kinsey, Little, Marchand, Marr, Mumford, H. The question was then taken on striking out the 11th section; and also determined in the negative.

The question was then taken, Shall the said bill be engrossed and read a third time? and passed in the affirmative—yeas 95, nays 51, as follows:

TUESDAY, March 24.

Another member, to wit: from Pennsylvania, THOMAS J. ROGERS, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of John Ross, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

The SPEAKER presented a petition of John Anderson, praying that the bills which have been reported at this session for his relief, may be taken up and finally disposed of, with as little delay as possible.—Laid on the table.

Mr. LITTLE, from the Committee of Accounts, who were instructed by resolution to inquire into the causes of delay, in laying on the tables of the members of this House, the Message of the President of the United States, of the 14th instant, with its accompanying documents, made a report thereon, which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Adam Kinsey and Thomas French, which was read; when, Mr. W. reported a bill for the relief of the said Adam Kinsey and Thomas French, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HUGH NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill concerning the Territory of Alabama, which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, on Saturday next.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made a report on the petition of Jarius Loomis, and James Bassett, sailing-masters in the Navy of the United States, and commanding gun vessels, Nos. 149 and 154, which was read; when, Mr. P. reported a bill authorizing the payment of a sum of money to the officers and crews of gunboats Nos. 149 and 154, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLEASANTS also reported a bill concerning the heirs and legatees of Thomas Turner, deceased, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the select committee appointed on the subject, reported a bill fixing the time for the next meeting of Congress, which was read twice, and the further consideration thereof postponed until Tuesday, the 31st instant.

The SPEAKER laid before the House, a report of the Secretary of the Navy, on the petitions of Samuel Cheney and Robert Ramsey, which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House, a letter from Richard Bland Lee, Commissioner of Claims, transmitting reports of the facts in fifty-six cases, all from the State of New York, with the evidence accompanying each, taken under a second commission, attended by a special agent on the part of the United States.—Referred to the Committee of Claims.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act authorizing a subscription for the eleventh volume of State Papers; and an act regulating the pay and emoluments of brevet officers; in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

The said bills were respectively, read the first time.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting or securing to the town of St. Louis, in the Missouri Territory, as a common, all the sand bar or batture, formed by the recession of the Mississippi river, between the said town and low water mark; and to prohibit the location of any floating claim in the said Territory, thereon, or if any location should have been made, to prohibit by law the issuing of a patent therefor.

Resolved, also, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting by law the location of any floating claim, on any lands in the Territory of Missouri, the right of pre-emption to which land has been secured to any settler, by the act of the 12th of April, 1814, or if any such location should have been made, to prohibit by law, the issuing a patent therefor.

Resolved, also, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting by law the location of any floating claim, in the Territory of Missouri, on any lands, the right, title, or claim to which, has been at any time heretofore given notice of, or filed with either of the Boards of Commissioners in said Territory, or with the recorder of land titles, acting as such under any law of Congress, for the adjustment of land titles in said Territory, or, if any such location should have been made, to prohibit by law the issuing of patents therefor.

Resolved, also, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting by law the location of any floating claim in the Territory of Missouri, on any town lot, village lot, out lot, common field lot, or common, in, adjoining, or appertaining to any of the towns or villages in the Territory of Missouri, or if any such location shall have been made to prohibit by law the issuing of patents therefor.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Narcissus Broufin, and others," was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed resolution "directing the Secretary for the Department of State to prepare an index to the acts and resolutions of Congress, after the close of every session," was read the third time, and passed.

REMISSION OF DUTIES.

Mr. McLANE, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, made a report on the petition of Oliver H. Hicks, and Lockwood de Forest, which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House. The report is as follows:

The petitioners state, that on the 8th of June, 1816, they imported into the district of New York, in the schooner Eliza, from Berbice, thirty-nine tierces and one barrel of coffee; that, immediately upon landing it, the wharf being crowded, it was removed into the store of the petitioners; that, some time afterwards, they sold it by samples taken from a number of the casks, and on the 8th August following commenced delivering it to the purchaser. It was then discovered that eighteen of the casks were damaged, and, upon an application to the collector for an appraisement, and deduction of the duties, he had no power to act, the time allowed by law having expired. The petitioners then had it examined by the wardens of the port, and appraised by four merchants, and they pray Congress to pass an act authorizing a deduction of the duties in proportion to the damage.

The act of Congress authorizing a deduction of duties on damaged goods provides that no such allowance for the damage on goods that have been entered, and on which the duties have been paid or secured, and for which permit has been granted, and which on an examination prove to be damaged, shall be made, unless proof to ascertain such damage shall be lodged in the custom-house within ten days after landing such merchandise.

In this case the coffee had been entered, the duties secured, permit granted, and the merchandise actually in the possession of the owners, and under their observation, two months before any damage was alleged; and the case is therefore, within both the letter and spirit of the law.

Although it may be proper for Congress to grant relief in cases coming within the letter of the law, though not within its spirit, it would be a dangerous precedent to relieve in a case coming clearly within the mischief designed to be guarded against, and that too by the act of the owner.

The act of Congress is intended to guard against all the means of fraud, and has allowed the owner ten days for the discovery of the damage, presuming it necessary for the safety of the revenue that a longer time should not be afforded.

In this case, the owners took the merchandise from the wharf at their own risk; if they neglected to examine it sooner, it is their own fault, and there is no reason shown to the committee why a greater indulgence should be given than is allowed in ordinary cases.

It does, however, appear that this coffee did not altogether escape the observation of the petitioners; they actually sold it by samples; and though it so happened that the samples were all taken from the sound casks, it is not an accident for which the Government should be liable. The committee, therefore, recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted.

NATIONAL FLAG.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to alter the flag of the United States [providing that from and after the fourth day of July next, the flag of the United States be thirteen horizontal stripes, alternate red and white; that the Union be twenty stars, white in a blue field; and that, on the admission of every new State into the Union, one star be added to the Union of the flag, and that such addition shall take effect on the fourth day of July then next succeeding such admission.]

Mr. WENDOVER rose. In complying with a duty incumbent on me, said Mr. W., as resulting from a proposition I had the honor to submit to the House, for altering in part the flag of the United States, I feel no disposition to consume much of the time of the Committee, or to indulge in the many observations which the nature of the subject might appear to justify. But I ask the patience of the Committee while I state a few of the considerations which present themselves in favor of the bill now on your table.

Sir, the importance attached to a national flag, both in its literal and figurative use, is so universal, and of such ancient origin, that we seldom inquire into the meaning of their various figures, as adopted by other nations, and are in some danger of forgetting the symbolical application of those composing that of our own.

Were we now about to devise suitable emblems for a national flag, I doubt not we should see much diversity of sentiment, and perhaps some efforts for local gratification; but I presume we should unite in some general and appropriate figures referring not to sectional but national objects. But on this subject we need not differ. Suitable symbols were devised by those who laid the foundation of the Republic; and I hope their children will ever feel themselves in honor precluded from changing these, except so far as necessity may dictate, and with a direct view of expressing by them their original design.

Mr. Chairman, I am not particularly informed as to the origin of our flag; but have repeatedly heard it was first used by a citizen of Philadelphia, on his own vessel, and afterwards adopted by the Congress of the Revolution, as appropriate to and emblematical of these confederated States, contending for the rights of man, and the rich boon of an independent Government. At its adoption our flag was founded on a representative principle, and in the arrangement of its parts made applicable to the number of the States then united against the common foe.

The same representative principle was retained and applied when the flag was altered; but experience having shown that a similar extension of numbers throughout, the flag would now be improper and inconvenient. It is worthy the attention of the National Legislature again to consider the subject, and see if it be practicable to retain in it the object contemplated by its founders, as pointing to the component parts of the nation, without losing sight of the original formation of this Government as a free republic.

Sir, the flag of the United States having undergone some change, and in its present state being altogether inappropriate, we are called upon to determine whether a further change be not advisable; and, if it be, what alteration will be most proper, and best to apply to the present and relative state of the nation, consistent with the representative character of the flag. If you do not alter it, you do injustice to the States admitted into the Union since the former alteration; and if you alter in the way as before, you will destroy the conspicuity of your flag, and render it too indistinct to be known at a distance, and increase the inconvenience already experienced.

At the present day, and particularly since the commencement of the late war, there are few vessels, however small, if they carry a mast, but are furnished with a flag of some description; and it is well known to gentlemen living on the seaboard, and others, that it is impracticable for small vessels to conform even to the present law; and the law itself does not correspond with the existing or original facts.

The flag of the United States was altered by law, from thirteen to fifteen stripes and stars, on the first of May, 1795, to apply to the admission of Vermont and Kentucky into the Union. On the first of June, 1796, Tennessee was admitted. Thus the alteration was applicable to the fact on which it was predicated, for the short space of one year and one month. On the 19th of February, 1803, Ohio was admitted, Louisiana on the 30th of April, 1812. Indiana was admitted at the last session of Congress, and Mississippi at the present session, and you now have on your table a bill for the admission of another State. Calculating on such a result caused many to regret the former alteration; and no doubt the same reason operated in the House of Representatives when the bill passed, and will account for the small majority of eight by which it succeeded.

I presume none will now advocate the propriety of continuing the fifteen stripes as at present; that number was founded on a mere contingency, which has since repeatedly happened, and will frequently occur; whereas the number proposed by the bill refers to our national origin, and is equally interesting to all.

Sir, it cannot be deemed proper to go on and increase the stripes in your flag. There are now twenty States; what number they will ultimately extend to none can conjecture. For my own part, I doubt not there will in time be accessions from the East, from the North, from the West, and from the South. Sir, I am not now speaking of conquest. I am willing every people should "manage their own affairs in their own way." But I can no more believe that any portion of the earth will remain in perpetual thralldom, and be forever tributary to a foreign Power, than I can subscribe to the doctrine of a ceaseless succession of legitimate kings.

Sir, it cannot be deemed desirable, under the existing state of things, in relation to the stripes and stars in the flag, to retain it in its present situation; it is not only inapplicable, but both parts refer to the same thing, and the one is a duplicate of the other; but the alteration proposed will direct the view to two striking facts in our national history, and teach the world an important reality, that republican government is not only practicable, but that it is also progressive.

Is it desirable to produce greater uniformity? Most undoubtedly it is. In the navy the law is generally conformed to, but it is well known that uniformity does not elsewhere exist. If evidence were wanting, among other and numerous instances, I would refer you to the flag at this moment waving over the heads of the Representatives of the nation, and two others in sight, equally the flags of the Government: while the law directs that the flag shall contain fifteen, that on the Hall of Congress, whence laws emanate, has but thirteen, and those at the Navy Yard and Marine Barracks have each at least eighteen stripes. Nor can I omit to mention the flag under which the last Congress sat during its first session, which, from some cause or other unknown to me, had but nine stripes. But even that flag, with all its defects, was entitled to much honor, for it was not only striped, but, to use another British cant, it was "Ragged Bunting," and was the first flag hoisted on the Hall of Congress, after the proverbial "Bulwark of Religion" had here, in this city, shown its anxious solicitude to promote the useful arts.

ing," and was the first flag hoisted on the Hall of Congress, after the proverbial "Bulwark of Religion" had here, in this city, shown its anxious solicitude to promote the useful arts.

Sir, I consider the plan proposed as in unison with the original design; it points to the States as they commenced and as they now are, and will, with an inconsiderable addition, direct the mind to a future state of things. The necessary alteration, either now or hereafter, can be made by almost any person, at any place and at any time; and the proposition, if adopted, will in future save the expense of legislating on the subject.

The committee who reported this bill deemed it advisable to direct that the stripes be horizontal; this is now the form in use; but it results from example, and not from the act, and would be equally conformable to law, if the stripes were arranged in a perpendicular direction. There is, indeed, one exception in practice. Under the laws for the collection of impost and tonnage, the Executive has directed that the cutters and boats employed in this service shall carry ensigns and pennants, with perpendicular stripes, and other marks of distinction; but this being alterable at the pleasure of the President, forms no objection to the proposition in the bill; and it is obviously proper to define the form in this particular, when it is considered that in this only has been the distinction between the flags of two different nations, and was recently the case as regarded those of France and Holland.

As to the particular disposition of the stars in the union of the flag, the committee were of opinion that might be left at the discretion of persons more immediately concerned; either to arrange them in the form of one great luminary, or in the words of the original resolution of 1777, "representing a new constellation."

Mr. Chairman, in viewing this subject, there appears to be a happy coincidence of circumstances, in having adopted the symbols in your flag, and a peculiar fitness of things, in making the proposed alteration. In that part designed at a distance to characterize your country, and which ought, for the information of other nations, to appear conspicuous and remain permanent, you present the number of the stars that burst the bands of oppression, and achieved your independence; while in the part intended for a nearer, or home view, you see a representation of your happy Union as it now exists, and space sufficient to embrace the symbols of those who may hereafter join under your banners.

Sir, could I be so fortunate as to escape the charge of mistaking fancy for fact, and be permitted, on this figurative subject, to draw a parallel, I should attempt to show that, in another point of view there is a propriety and an aptness in having adopted and in now restoring the thirteen stripes. Sir, you have recently been at war with a powerful nation; that war, from its declaration to its final termination, continued precisely three years. In that war, though your arms were generally victorious, yet in a more signal manner, in the first year, you beat the enemy on the ocean; in the second year, on the lakes; and in the third year, on the land. Thus, then, by triplication, indicated by the time three years, or by the fact of conquest over the three descriptions of force arrayed against you, and viewing your flag as of right composed of thirteen stripes, you have but executed the authority vested in the Israelites of old in cases of controversy, and beaten the enemy with forty stripes, save one.

Sir, the proposition before you is predicated on the fact already stated, that your flag has been altered. Were it not so, I presume it would not now be changed; it is at present inapplicable to original or existing facts; let it now be made to refer to both. Where is the American who feels not a becoming pride and gratitude in retrospect to the days of the Revolution; when the blood of our fathers profusely flowed, to procure for us a rich inheritance? In their memory, and to their honor, let us restore substantially the flag under which they conquered, and at the same time engraft into its figure the after-fruits of their toil.

Mr. Chairman, I hope this bill will pass, and wish it to pass with much unanimity; not only because I believe it will meet the public approbation, and be best calculated to give sufficient permanency to the form of your flag, but because there yet remains a few, and, indeed, but few, who first nerved their arm to raise this banner of freedom, and nobly defended it, through carnage and blood, to victory and to peace. With hoary locks and tottering frame they have been preserved to see it acquire a renown which I trust will never fade; and have lived to witness in their sons that heroic spirit, which assures them that their privations and their arduous struggle in defence of liberty have not been in vain.

Sir, I believe it is now the time to legislate on this subject; your flag now stands pre-eminently high in the estimation of other nations, and it is justly the pride of your own. And although, for a moment, your flag was veiled at Detroit, and left to droop at Castine; and although (if I may so express it) it was made to weep at Washington, it has not lost its lustre—it remains unsullied. No disgrace has attached to your "star-spangled banner." It has been the signal of victory on the land, of successful valor on the lakes, and waved triumphantly on the ocean. And even on those who predicted that in "nine months the striped bunting would be swept from the ocean," it possessed the wonderful charm, that before the nine months had elapsed, "fir-built frigates" and "Yankee cock-boats" were magnified into "ships-of-the-line;" and His Majesty's faithful officers, careful for the preservation of British Oak, sought protection for their frigates under the convoy of seventy-four-gun ships.

Sir, this subject has for some time been before the public; it has been examined and approved by many gentlemen of rank and experience in the Navy and Army of the United States; it meets the approbation of the gentlemen at the head of these departments; and, as far as I am informed, that of the public generally; and I presume none will doubt the propriety of endeavoring to produce greater uniformity in the use of the flag, as well as to give it a more significant application than it now has.

H. of R.

Spanish American Provinces.

MARCH, 1818.

But, sir, whatever be the fate of this bill, I hope the time is not distant when you will give to your flag its deserved honor, as the guardian of your citizens; when your hardy seamen shall no longer be doomed to the degradation to ask for, nor you to give them, paper protections; but, when they shall point aloft to the flag of their country, and say, "This is the protection of freemen; under this we desire peacefully to traverse the ocean and sail to every clime. But perish the arm that shall attempt to seize upon our persons; and we, to the nation that shall dare to infringe our country's rights!" And whenever called to the contest by the voice of their country, may they rally round the "star-spangled banner," and emphatically exclaim—

"High-waving, unsullied, unstruck, proudly showeth, What each friend, and each foe, and each neutral well knoweth;

That her path is ethereal, high she aspires,
Her stripes aloft streaming, like boreal fires."
Joined with Stars, "They astonish, dismay, or delight.

As the foe, or the friend, may encounter the sight."

Mr. Chairman, I shall add no more. The subject is plain and well understood; and though not of a character to be classed with those of the highest national importance, is still proper to be acted on, and worthy the attention of the Representatives of a people whose flag will never be insulted for want of protectors, and which, I hope and believe, will never be struck to an inferior or equal force.

Mr. POINDEXTER moved to amend the bill by reducing the number of stars to seven, the number of States added to the Union since the declaration of Independence, leaving the number of stripes as the bill proposed; so that the stars might represent the number of new States, and the stripes answer to the number of the original thirteen States; which motion Mr. P. advocated by several arguments.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, made a few remarks in opposition to this motion; to whom

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, replied, and supported the motion of Mr. POINDEXTER against the proposition contained in the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER's motion was lost without a division, and the Committee rose and reported the bill to the House without amendment.

Mr. B. then renewed his motion without success; when

Mr. FOLGER moved to strike out the second section of the bill, providing for the additional star for every new State, and to amend the first section by fixing the number of stars at thirteen instead of twenty.

This motion was negatived, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

SPANISH AMERICAN PROVINCES.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the appropriation bill; the clause appropriating thirty thousand dollars for compensation to the Commissioners, sent to South America by the Executive in December last, under consideration.

Mr. CLAY wished to know if this appropriation was to defray the expenses of the commission lately sent to South America; if so, he would ask of the chairmen of the Committee of Ways and Means and the Committee of Foreign Relations, whether those Commissioners were furnished with credentials, and if their appointment had been confirmed by the Senate; also, to what ports of South America they were sent, and the probable duration of the commission; and, also, if it would not be looking too much into its objects, he would be glad to know what those objects were.

Mr. LOWNDES said, that although he had not all the information required by the Speaker, yet, he was possessed of something on the subject more than newspaper intelligence. It must be recollected that the objects of the Committee of Ways and Means were confined merely to the financial department; they had, however, some information on this subject, received in reply to some inquiries that the committee had, in the performance of their duties, addressed to the Department of State, which would answer the Speaker's inquiry as to the credentials and the probable duration of the commission. The other points did not come within the objects belonging to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The papers referred to by Mr. L. were handed up by him, and read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 2, 1818.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose a copy of the commission from this Department with which Messrs. Rodney, Graham, and Bland, were furnished by direction of the President. They have, as you will perceive, no distinct diplomatic rank. They are expected to be absent seven or eight months; and the compensation allowed them by the President is $6,000 each, and $2,000 to their Secretary. Their expenses on the voyage, until their return, except while on shore in South America, are likewise allowed; and Messrs. Rodney and Graham having been appointed in June last, and prepared to go, but by various accidents detained until the beginning of December, when they sailed, claim on that account a further allowance. If, after their arrival at Buenos Ayres, they find it advisable that one or more of them should remain on that continent, and go to Chili, that measure is within their discretionary powers. As this contingency was, however, not expected as probable; and, if it should occur, it was not foreseen to what extent of time it might go, no specific allowance was fixed upon for it. Under these circumstances, it was anticipated that the sum of thirty thousand dollars would not more than suffice to cover the expenses of the mission.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

W. LOWNDES, Esq., Chairman, &c.

MARCH, 1818.

Spanish American Provinces.

H. of R.

To all who shall see these presents:

Be it Known, Cesar Augustus Rodney, John Graham, and Theodorick Bland, three distinguished citizens of the United States, and enjoying, in a high degree, the confidence and esteem of the President, are about to visit, in a national ship, on just and friendly objects, and at the special desire of the President, diverse places and countries in South America.

These are therefore to request that, whithersoever they may go, they, with their suite, may be received and treated in a manner due to the confidence reposed in them, and each of them, as aforesaid, by the President of the United States, and to their own merit.

Given under my hand, and the seal of the Department of State, this twenty-fourth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventeen.

JOHN Q. ADAMS,
Secretary of State.

Mr. CLAY rose, not, he said, to make any objection to the three respectable citizens for whom this appropriation was intended—that was not his object; but to enter his protest to this kind of appropriation by Congress. As to the object of the commission, he thought it of very little use for the expenditure of public money; he referred to the views avowed, and the directions to touch at Buenos Ayres, &c., and said, if the object of the commission was to acquire information of the actual state of affairs in the Southern provinces, it was the most unfortunate mode that could have been adopted for that purpose. What, asked Mr. C., was this mode? Three distinguished citizens are selected, their appointment and intentions are announced by the newspapers, months before their departure, then declared by the President himself, and made known to the whole world, and they depart with all the paraphernalia of public Ministers; information of their object precedes them wherever they go. As soon as they arrive at a South American port they are surrounded by all the factions in the country; royalists, if there were any, as well as republicans; who strive to prejudice them in favor of their respective interests, to mislead their judgments and prevent the getting correct information of the real condition of things. Mr. C. described the extent of the interior provinces of Buenos Ayres, to show that the time allowed to the Commissioners (if they were acquainted with the language, manners, and habits, of the country) was inadequate to enable them to make any material addition to our stock of information; but, even if they could, were they to range the whole continent, and visit even the armies, whether successful or not, of the different parties, still, their object being known, they would everywhere be liable to the same deception and imposition. Correct information they would not obtain. The proper course to have adopted, Mr. C. said, was to despatch an individual unknown to all parties; some intelligent, keen, silent, and observing man, of pleasing address and insinuating manners, who, concealing the object of his visit, would see and hear everything, and report it faithfully.

But it was not to the object of the appropriation, boldly as the mission had been devised, that Mr. C. rose to object; it was the Constitutional point it involved that made it obnoxious; and he read the clause of the Constitution which requires the consent and concurrence of the Senate to all appointments not specifically provided for by law, to show that these Commissioners should have been nominated to that body—taking it for granted, that they had not been submitted to the Senate. The President had not only made these appointments without the authority of the Constitution, or of any law recognising them, but in derogation from a positive act of Congress. There was an act of Congress fixing the grade of the only Ministers we sent abroad, and it provided for two cases only, that of Minister Plenipotentiary and that of Chargé des Affaires. To the first it assigned a salary of $9,000, to the last a salary of $4,500. Here were Commissioners, then, sent with a salary fixed by the sole authority of the President, and not conformable to that prescribed by the law in either of the two grades. If he might assign $6,000, what was there to prevent his allowance of 50,000? It might be said in that case this House would afford a remedy; but gentlemen would perceive how difficult it would be, to withhold from an agent an appropriation, which had been promised and pledged by the Executive. There was a contingent fund of $50,000 allowed to the President by law, which he was authorized to expend without rendering to Congress any account of it—it was confided to his discretion, and, if the compensation of the Commissioners had been made from that fund, Mr. C. said, it would not have been a proper subject for inquiry; but, under present circumstances, in opposition to the Constitution, he could not be going too far, in giving at least his protest to this appropriation. It was not his intention to make any motion on the subject, and he made none.

Mr. FORSYTH said, the Constitution vests the Executive with the powers to make appointments in the recess of the Senate. Whether these were such as required the confirmation of the Senate, had been or would be submitted for that purpose, to that body, he did not know, nor was it necessary to inquire. He presumed what ought to be done would be done, and he was disposed to leave the subject to the Executive and to the Senate, to whom it more properly belonged. If the idea of the Speaker was correct, and these were officers requiring a nomination to, and the appropriation of the Senate, yet, as they were appointed in the recess, no Constitutional wrong had been done in their appointment. But the Speaker had objected to this commission because it was useless, if it was information they went for. Was it not proper and necessary, Mr. F. asked, for the Government to have information of the state of the South American provinces—of their actual political condition, their prospects of success, &c.? If so, this information could be obtained only in two ways—by the newspapers, or by agents sent out for the purpose. The vague and uncertain reports given in the newspapers could not be relied on, and the President had thought proper to send intelligent agents to obtain the knowledge desired. It was probable that a private man might have obtained this information better; but there was another point to be considered—the importance of this information to the Government was such, that it would be necessary that this individual should be an American, and the kind of information to be acquired might have subjected him to the fate of other Americans in the Spanish provinces; he might have been thrown into a dungeon. The opposite party might adopt this course to prevent his communicating the information he should have acquired. This had been done; American citizens had been thrown into dungeons. In whatever aspect this subject was viewed, Mr. F. could see no impropriety in voting this appropriation. It was true the President might have taken it out of the secret service fund, and no inquiry would have been made about it; but, in order to meet all the expenses of the mission, it might have been necessary to ask a further appropriation for this fund, and then the inquiry would have been made, for what it was wanted. The present course, he thought, was more honorable and fair. It would have been necessary nearly to double the ordinary contingent fund, and it would have been a conclusive objection to the appropriation, that Congress was ignorant of the object to which it was to be applied. Would the House have been willing to vote an addition to the secret service fund, for what might have been considered the employment of spies throughout the world? This objection to such an appropriation, he believed, would have been made with effect; and it was much better for the Executive to proceed in the present open and frank manner. Mr. F. took occasion, in reply to an allusion of Mr. CLAY, to say, that it was true he did not find fault with the Executive quite as often as the honorable Speaker had latterly done, but still he was not the defender of all Executive measures. The Committee would do him the justice to recollect that he sometimes differed from the Executive, and never failed to censure what he believed censurable.

Mr. CLAY said, in reply, that Mr. FORSYTH had not controverted the objection that these appointments had not been submitted to the Senate. But these agents were to be provided for, either in the quality of Ministers or Chargés des Affaires; and, considered in either capacity, the House was called on to make a larger appropriation than was authorized by law for officers of that character. As to a private agent being liable to the fate mentioned by Mr. FORSYTH, what, he asked, were the immunities of the present Commissioners? Nothing more, he said, than those of a private man. It had even been decided, in the affair of the Russian Consul at Philadelphia, that Consuls Generals were not entitled to the immunities of Ministers. But, could not the President have given the same commission to one man, sent privately to obtain information, as to those three Commissioners, and with the same effect and validity? As to the object of the commission, Mr. C. again asked, how these gentlemen were to acquire this information respecting the independence of the South American provinces? The fact of their independence was not to be established by a dedimus potestatum sent out to take depositions. The independence of some of these States was matter of history—was too notorious to require the evidence of those Commissioners. And Mr. C. referred to the condition of some of the South American States, on which the knowledge was complete, and contended that they had been sent to parts, with regard to which (Venezuela and Buenos Ayres, for example) our information was most perfect, and were not to visit all those parts (Mexico and New Grenada) from which we most wanted it. Mr. C. again adverted to the manner in which the Commissioners had been appointed, which being done not according to law, was the more improper, as they had not sailed till after the meeting of Congress, when it would have been scarcely any detention to have waited the concurrence of the Senate, which was in session when they departed.

Mr. HOPKINSON observed, that he did not rise to express any opinion upon the object or utility of the mission in question—he was willing to agree in both; but he desired to express distinctly his dissent to the appropriation, because he believed the appointment of these Commissioners was of a kind, under the provision and spirit of our Constitution, to require the approbation and assent of the Senate, and because he had no reason to believe such assent had ever been given by the Senate, or asked by the Executive. He thought it more important for us, as the Representatives of the American people, to attend to and guard our own Constitution, than to send abroad to inquire into the form of government of other people. Mr. H. said, that being up, he would take occasion to say that he saw little or no difference between sending a Minister without consulting the Senate, in a case when their assent is admitted to be necessary, and sending him just on the eve of the meeting of that body, without any known urgency, and afterwards submitting the appointment to the Senate. Nobody can believe the Senate can exercise that free and unembarrassed judgment upon the nomination which the Constitution intended they should have, after the Minister had actually embarked and sailed for his destination, with his outfit and other expenses of the mission.

On the suggestion of Mr. LOWMEYER this appropriation was passed by for the present, that in the meantime the additional information which had been asked for by the Speaker might be obtained from the Department of State.

Mr. CLAY rose, and moved to insert in the bill a provision to appropriate the sum of eighteen thousand dollars as the outfit and one year's salary of a Minister to be deputed from the United States to the independent provinces of the River Plata, in South America.

This proposition Mr. C. followed up by entering into a discussion of the question, involved in his motion, of a formal recognition of the independence of the South American States mentioned. He had spoken something more than an hour, when (having given way for a motion to that effect) the Committee rose, about half-past four o'clock, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 25.

On motion of Mr. MARR, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what further provisions of law are necessary for preventing waste and trespass on that portion of the public lands which have been, or may hereafter be, reserved for the use of schools.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act regulating the pay and emoluments of brevet rank," was read the second time and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing a subscription for the 11th volume of State Papers," was read the second time and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of this House of the following titles, to wit: "An act respecting the district courts of the United States within the State of New York," and "An act to alter the time of holding the circuit court in the southern district of New York, and for other purposes," with amendments to each; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendments to each of the said bills were read, and severally referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned," was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill to alter the flag of the United States was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act regulating the pay and emoluments of brevet rank," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill of this House to repeal so much of an act as allows pay and emoluments to brevet rank.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the same committee, also reported the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Ashael Clark," without amendment, and the bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill for the relief of Birdsall & Foster.

EXECUTIVE PAPERS.

Several Messages were received from the President of the United States. The first of the said Messages was read, and is as follows:

WASHINGTON, March 24, 1818.

In pursuance of a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 7th instant, I now transmit the report of the Secretary of State, with a statement of the expenses incurred under the 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th articles of the Treaty of Ghent, specifying the items of expenditure in relation to each.

JAMES MONROE.

The second of the said Messages was read, and is as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In conformity with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 5th of December last, I now transmit a report of the Secretary of State, with a copy of the documents which it is thought proper to communicate, relating to the independence and political condition of the provinces of Spanish America.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, March 25, 1818.

The report of the Secretary of State is as follows:

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 15th of December, has the honor of submitting the documents herewith transmitted, as containing the information possessed at his department, requested by that resolution.

In the communications received from Don Manuel H. de Aguirre, there are references to certain conferences between him and the Secretary of State, which appear to require some explanation.

The character in which Mr. Aguirre presented himself was that of a public agent from the Government of La Plata, and of private agent of that of Chili—his commissions from both simply qualified him as agent; but his letter from the Supreme Director Pueyrredon, to the President of the United States, requested that he might be received with the consideration due to his diplomatic character. He had no commission as a public Minister of any rank, nor any full power to negotiate as such. Neither the letter, of which he was the bearer, nor he himself, at his first interviews with the Secretary of State, suggested that he was authorized to ask the acknowledgment of his Government as independent—a circumstance which derived additional weight from the fact, that his predecessor, Don Martin Thompson, had been dismissed by the Director Pueyrredon for having transcended his powers, of which the letter brought by Mr. Aguirre gave notice to the President.

It was some time after the commencement of the session of Congress that he made this demand, as will be seen by the dates of his written communications to the Department. In the conferences held with him on that subject, among other questions which it naturally suggested, were those of the manner in which the acknowledgment of his Government, should be deemed advisable, might be made? and what were the territories which he considered as forming the State or nation to be recognised? It was observed, that the manner in which the United States had been acknowledged as an independent Power by France, was, by a treaty concluded with them, as an existing independent Power, and in which each one of the States, then composing the Union, was distinctly named; that something of the same kind seemed to be necessary in the first acknowledgment of a new Government, that some definite idea might be formed, not of the precise boundaries, but of the general extent of the country thus recognised. He said the Government of which he desired the acknowledgment was of the country which had, before the revolution, been the Vice Royalty of La Plata. It was then asked, whether that did not include Montevideo and the territory occupied by the Portuguese—the Banda Oriental, understood to be under the government of General Artigas, and several provinces, still in the undisputed possession of the Spanish Government. He said it did; but observed, that Artigas, though in hostility with the Government of Buenos Ayres, supported, however, the cause of independence of Spain—and that the Portuguese could not ultimately maintain their possession of Montevideo. It was after this that Mr. Aguirre wrote the letter, offering to enter into a negotiation for conducting a treaty; though admitting that he had no authority to that effect from his Government. It may be proper to observe, that the mode of recognition by concluding a treaty had not been suggested as the only one practicable or usual, but merely as that which had been adopted by France with the United States, and as offering the most convenient means of designating the extent of the territory acknowledged as a new dominion.

The remark to Mr. Aguirre, that if Buenos Ayres should be acknowledged as independent, others of the contending Provinces would, perhaps, demand the same, had particular reference to the Banda Oriental. The inquiry was, whether General Artigas might not advance a claim of independence for those Provinces, conflicting with that of Buenos Ayres for the whole Vice Royalty of La Plata? The Portuguese possession of Montevideo was noticed in reference to a similar question.

It should be added, that these observations were connected with others, stating the reasons upon which the present acknowledgment of the Government of La Plata, in any mode, was deemed by the President inexpedient, in regard as well to their interests as to those of the United States.

SPANISH AMERICAN PROVINCES.

The House having again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the annual general appropriation bill; and Mr. CLAY's proposition to amend the bill by inserting a clause for appropriating $18,000 for the outfit and year's salary of a Minister to Buenos Ayres, yet pending, Mr. CLAY concluded, in a speech of three hours in length, the observations he yesterday commenced in support of his proposition; the whole of which is given entire, as follows:

Mr. CLAY said he rose, under feelings of deep regret than he had ever experienced on any former occasion, inspired, principally, by the painful consideration that he found himself, on the proposition which he meant to submit, differing from many highly esteemed friends, in and out of this House, for whose judgment he entertained the greatest respect. A knowledge of this circumstance had induced him to pause; to subject his own convictions to the severest scrutiny; and to revolve the question over and over again. But all his reflections had conducted him to the same clear result; and much as he valued those friends, great as his deference was for their opinions, he could not hesitate, when reduced to the distressing alternative of conforming his judgment to theirs, or pursuing the deliberate and matured dictates of his own mind. He enjoyed some consolation, for the want of their co-operation, from the persuasion that, if he erred on this occasion, he erred on the side of the liberty and the happiness of a large portion of the human family. Another, and, if possible, indeed a greater source of the regret to which he referred, was the utter incompetency which he unfeignedly felt to do anything like adequate justice to the great cause of American independence and freedom, whose interests he wished to promote by his humble exertions, in this instance. Exhausted and worn down as he was, by the fatigue, confinement, and incessant application incident to the arduous duties of the honorable station he held, during a four month's session, he should need all that kind indulgence which had been so often extended to him by the House.

He begged, in the first place, to correct misconceptions, if any existed, in regard to his opinions. He was averse from war with Spain, or with any Power. He would give no just cause of war to any Power—not to Spain herself. He had seen enough of war, and of its calamities, when even successful. No country upon earth had more interest than this in cultivating peace, and avoiding war, as long as it was possible honorably to avoid it. Gaining additional strength every day; our numbers doubling in periods of twenty-five years; with an income outstripping all our estimates, and so great as, after a war in some respects disastrous, to furnish results which carry astonishment, if not dismay, into the bosom of the States jealous of our rising importance, we had every motive for the love of peace. He could not, however, approve, in all respects, of the manner in which our negotiation with Spain had been con-

The last of the said Messages was read, and is as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I now lay before Congress all the information in the possession of the Executive respecting the war with the Seminoles, and the measures which it has been thought proper to adopt for the safety of our fellow-citizens on the frontier exposed to their ravages. The enclosed documents show that the hostilities of this tribe were unprovoked, the offspring of a spirit long cherished, and often manifested towards the United States, and that, in the present instance, it was extending itself to other tribes, and daily assuming a more serious aspect. As soon as the nature and object of this combination were perceived, the Major General commanding the southern division of the troops of the United States, was ordered to the theatre of action, charged with the management of the war, and vested with the powers necessary to give it effect. The season of the year being unfavorable to active operations, and the recesses of the country affording shelter to these savages, in case of retreat, may prevent a prompt termination of the war, but it may be fairly presumed that it will not be long before this tribe, and its associates, receive the punishment which they have provoked and justly merited.

As almost the whole of this tribe inhabits the country within the limits of Florida, Spain was bound, by the Treaty of 1795, to restrain them from committing hostilities against the United States. We have seen with regret that her Government has altogether failed to fulfil this obligation, nor are we aware that it made any effort to that effect. When we consider her utter inability to check, even in the slightest degree, the movements of this tribe, by her very small and incompetent force in Florida, we are not disposed to ascribe the failure to any other cause. The inability, however, of Spain to maintain her authority over the territory and Indians within her limits, and in consequence to fulfil the treaty, ought not to expose the United States to other and greater injuries. When the authority of Spain ceases to exist there, the United States have a right to pursue their enemy, on a principle of self-defence. In this instance the right is more complete and obvious, because we shall perform only what Spain was bound to have performed herself. To the high obligations and privileges of this great and sacred right of self-defence, will the movement of our troops be strictly confined. Orders have been given to the General in command not to enter Florida, unless it be in pursuit of the enemy, and in that case to respect the Spanish authority wherever it is maintained, and he will be instructed to withdraw his forces from the province as soon as he shall have reduced that tribe to order, and secure our fellow-citizens, in that quarter, by satisfactory arrangements, against its unprovoked and savage hostilities in future.

ducted. If ever a favorable time existed for the demand, on the part of an injured nation, of indemnity for past wrongs, from the aggressor, such was the present time. Impoverished and exhausted at home, by the wars which have desolated the Peninsula, with a foreign war, calling for infinite more resources in men and money, than she can possibly command, this is the auspicious period for insisting upon justice at her hands, in a firm and decided tone. Time is precisely what Spain now most wants. Yet what were we told by the President, in his Message, at the commencement of Congress? That Spain had procrastinated, and we acquiesced in her procrastination. And the Secretary of State, in the late communication with Mr. Onís, after ably vindicating all our rights, tells the Spanish Minister, with a good deal of sang froid, that we had patiently waited thirteen years for a redress of our injuries, and that it required no great effort to wait longer! He would have abstained from thus exposing our intentions. Avoiding the use of the language of menace, he would have required, in temperate and decided terms, indemnity for all our wrongs; for the spoliation upon our commerce; for the interruption of the right of depot at New Orleans, guaranteed by treaty; for the insults repeatedly offered to our flag; for the Indian hostilities which she was bound to prevent; for the belligerent use made of her ports and territories by our enemy, during the late war—and the instantaneous liberation of the free citizens of the United States, now imprisoned in her jails. Contemporaneous with that demand, without waiting for her final answer, and with a view to the favorable operation on her councils, in regard to our own peculiar interests, as well as in justice to the cause itself, he would recognize any established government in Spanish America. He would have left Spain to draw her own inferences from these proceedings, as to the ultimate step which this country might adopt, if she longer withheld justice from us. And if she persevered in her iniquity, after we had conducted the negotiation in the manner he had endeavored to describe, he would then take up and decide the solemn question of peace or war, with the advantage of all the light shed upon it by subsequent events and the probable conduct of Europe.

Spain had undoubtedly given us abundant and just cause of war. But, it was not every cause of war that should lead to war. War was one of those dreadful scourges that so shakes the foundation of society; overturns or changes the character of governments; interrupts or destroys the pursuits of private happiness; brings, in short, misery and wretchedness in so many forms; and at last is, in its issue, so doubtful and hazardous; that nothing but dire necessity can justify an appeal to arms. If we were to have war with Spain, he had however no hesitation in saying that no mode of bringing it about could be less fortunate than that of seizing, at this time, upon her adjoining province. There was a time, under other circumstances, when we might have occupied East Florida, with safety: had we then taken it, our posture in the negotiation with Spain would have been totally different from what it is. But, we had permitted that time, not with his consent, to pass by unimproved. If we were to seize upon Florida, after a great change in those circumstances and after declaring our intention to acquiesce in the procrastination desired by Spain, in what light should we be viewed by foreign Powers, particularly Great Britain? We have already been accused of inordinate ambition, and of seeking to aggrandize ourselves by an extension, on all sides, of our limits. Should we not, by such an act of violence, give color to the accusation? No, Mr. Chairman, if we are to be involved in war with Spain, let us have the credit of disinterestedness; let us put her yet more in the wrong. Let us command the respect which is never withheld from those who act a noble and generous part. He hoped to communicate to the Committee the conviction which he so strongly felt, that, adopting the amendment which he intended to propose, would not hazard, in the slightest degree, the peace of the country. But if that peace were to be endangered, he would infinitely rather it should be for our exerting the right, appertaining to every State, of acknowledging the independence of another State, than for the seizure of a province which sooner or later we must certainly acquire.

Mr. CLAY proceeded. In contemplating the great struggle in which Spanish America is now engaged, our attention is first fixed by the immensity and character of the country which Spain seeks again to subjugate. Stretching on the Pacific Ocean from about the 40th degree of north latitude, to about the 55th degree of south latitude, and extending from the mouth of the Rio del Norte (exclusive of East Florida) around the Gulf of Mexico, and along the South Atlantic to near Cape Horn, it is about 5,000 miles in length, and in some places near three thousand in breadth. Within this vast region, we behold the most sublime and interesting objects of creation; the loftiest mountains, the most majestic rivers in the world; the richest mines of the precious metals; and the choicest productions of the earth. We behold there a spectacle still more interesting and sublime—the glorious spectacle of eighteen millions of people, struggling to burst their chains and to be free. When we take a little nearer and more detailed view, we perceive that nature has, as it were, ordained that this people and this country shall ultimately constitute several different nations. Leaving the United States on the north, we come to New Spain, or the Vice Royalty of Mexico on the south; passing by Guatemala, we reach the Vice Royalty of New Grenada, the late Captain Generalship of Venezuela, and Guyana, lying on the east side of the Andes. Stepping over the Brazils, we arrive at the United Provinces of La Plata, and, crossing the Andes, we find Chili on their west side, and further north, the Vice Royalty of Lima or Peru. Each of these several parts is sufficient in itself, in point of limits, to constitute a powerful State, and, in point of population, that which has the smallest contains enough to make it respectable. Throughout all the extent of that great portion of the world, which he had attempted thus hastily to describe, the spirit of revolt against the dominion of Spain had manifested itself. The revolution had been attended with various degrees of success in the several parts of Spanish America. In some it had been already crowned, as he would endeavor to show, with complete success, and in all he was persuaded that independence had struck such deep root as that the power of Spain could never eradicate it. What were the causes of this great movement?

Three hundred years ago, upon the ruins of the thrones of Montezuma and the Incas of Peru, Spain erected the most stupendous system of colonial despotism that the world has ever seen—the most rigorous, the most exclusive. The great principle and object of this system has been to render one of the largest portions of the world exclusively subservient, in all its faculties, to the interests of an inconsiderable spot in Europe. To effectuate this aim of her policy, she locked Spanish America up from the rest of the world, and prohibited, under the severest penalties, any foreigner from entering any part of it. To keep the natives themselves ignorant of each other, and of the strength and resources of the several parts of her American possessions, she next prohibited the inhabitants of one Vice Royalty or Government from visiting those of another; so, that the inhabitants of Mexico, for example, were not allowed to enter the Vice Royalty of New Grenada. The agriculture of those vast regions was so regulated and restrained as to prevent all collision with the interests of the agriculture of the Peninsula. Where, nature, by the character and composition of the soil, had commanded, the abominable system of Spain has forbidden the growth of certain articles. Thus, the olive and the vine, to which Spanish America is so well adapted, are prohibited wherever their culture could interfere with the olive and the vine of the Peninsula. The commerce of the country, in the direction and objects of the exports and imports, is also subjected to the narrow and selfish views of Spain, and fettered by the odious spirit of monopoly existing in Cadiz. She has sought, by scattering discord among the several castes of her American population, and by a debasing course of education, to perpetuate her oppression. Whatever concerns public law, or the science of government, all writers upon political economy, or that tend to give vigor, and freedom, and expansion to the intellect, are prohibited. Gentlemen would be astonished by the long list of distinguished authors, whom she proscribes, to be found in Depon's and other works. A main feature in her policy is that which constantly elevates the European and depresses the American character. Out of upwards of 750 Viceroyalties and Captains General, whom she has appointed since the conquest of America, about eighteen only have been from the body of the American population. On all occasions she seeks to raise and promote her European subjects, and to degrade and humiliate the Creoles. Where-ever in America her sway extends, everything seems to pine and wither beneath its baneful influence. The richest regions of the earth; man, his happiness and his education; all the fine faculties of his soul, are regulated, and modified, and moulded, to suit the execrable purposes of an inexorable despotism.

Such is a brief and imperfect picture of the state of things in Spanish America in 1808, when the famous transactions of Bayonne occurred. The King of Spain and the Indies (for Spanish America had always constituted an integral part of the Spanish empire) abdicated his throne and became a voluntary captive. Even at this day, one does not know whether he should most condemn the baseness and perfidy of the one party, or despise the meanness and imbecility of the other. If the obligation of obedience and allegiance existed on the part of the colonies to the King of Spain, it was founded on the duty of protection which he owed them. By disqualifying himself from the performance of this duty, they became released from that obligation. The monarchy was dissolved, and each integral part had a right to seek its own happiness by the institution of any new government adapted to its wants. Joseph Bonaparte, the successor de facto of Ferdinand, recognised this right on the part of the colonies, and recommended them to establish their independence. Thus, upon the ground of strict right; upon the footing of a mere legal question, governed by forensic rules, the colonies, being absolved by the acts of the parent country from the duty of subjection to it, had an indisputable right to set up for themselves. But Mr. C. took a broader and bolder position. He maintained that an oppressed people were authorized, whenever they could, to rise and break their fetters. This was the great principle of the English Revolution. It was the great principle of our own. Vattel, if authority were wanting, expressly supports this right. We must pass sentence of condemnation upon the founders of our liberty—say that they were rebels, traitors, and that we are at this moment legislating without competent powers, before we could condemn the cause of Spanish America. Our Revolution was mainly directed against the mere theory of tyranny. We had suffered comparatively but little; we had, in some respects, been kindly treated; but our intrepid and intelligent fathers saw, in the usurpation of the power to levy an inconsiderable tax, the long train of oppressive acts that was to follow. They rose; they breasted the storm; they conquered our freedom. Spanish America, for centuries, has been doomed to the practical effects of an odious tyranny. If we were justified, she is more than justified.

Mr. C. said he was no propagandist. He would not seek to force upon other nations our principles and our liberty, if they did not want them. He would not disturb the repose even of a detestable despotism. But if an abused and oppressed people willed their freedom; if they sought to establish it; if, in truth, they had established it, we had a right, as a sovereign Power, to notice the fact, and to act as circumstances and our interest required. He would say, in the language of the venerated Father of His Country: "Born in a land of liberty, my anxious recollections, my sympathetic feelings, and my best wishes, are irresistibly excited, whensoever, in any country, I see an oppressed nation unfurl the banners of freedom." For his own part, Mr. C. said, that whenever he thought of Spanish America, the image irresistibly forced itself upon his mind of an elder brother, whose education had been neglected, whose person had been abused and maltreated, and who had been disinherited by the unkindness of an unnatural parent. And when he contemplated the glorious struggle which that country was now making, he thought he beheld that brother rising, by the power and energy of his fine native genius, to the manly rank which nature and nature's God intended for him.

If Spanish America were entitled to success from the justness of her cause, we had no less reason to wish that success from the horrible character which the royal arms have given to the war. More atrocities than those which had been perpetrated during its existence were not to be found even in the annals of Spain herself. And history, reserving some of her blackest pages for the name of Morillo, is prepared to place him along side of his great prototype, the infamous desolator of the Netherlands. He who has looted into the history of the conduct of this war, is constantly shocked at the revolting scenes which it portrays; at the refusal, on the part of the commanders of the royal forces, to treat, on any terms, with the other side; at the denial of quarters; at the butchery, in cold blood, of prisoners; at the violation of flags, in some cases, after being received with religious ceremonies; at the instigation of slaves to rise against their owners; and at acts of wanton and useless barbarity. Neither the weakness of the other sex, nor the imbecility of old age, nor the innocence of infants, nor the reverence due to the sacerdotal character, can stay the arm of royal vengeance. On this subject he begged leave to trouble the Committee with reading a few passages from a most authentic document, the manifesto of the Congress of the United Provinces of Rio de la Plata, published in October last. This was a paper of the highest authority; it was an appeal to the whole world; it asserted facts of notoriety in the face of the whole world. It was not to be credited, that the Congress would come forward with a statement which was not true, when the means, if it were false, of exposing their fabrications, must be so abundant, and so easy to command. It was a document, in short, that stood upon the same footing of authority with our own papers, promulgated during the Revolution by our Congress. He would add, that many of the facts which it affirmed, were corroborated by most respectable historical testimony, which was in his own possession.

[Mr. C. here read the following passages from the manifesto:]

"Memory shudders at the recital of the horrors that were then committed by Goyeneche, in Cochabamba. Would to heaven it were possible to blot from remembrance the name of that ungrateful and blood-thirsty American; who, on the day of his entry, ordered the virtuous Governor and Intendant, Antezana, to be shot; who, beholding from the balcony of his house that infamous murder, cried out with a ferocious voice to the soldiers, that they must not fire at the head, because he wanted it to be affixed to a pole; and who, after the head was taken off, ordered the cold corpse to be dragged through the streets; and, by a barbarous decree, placed the lives and fortunes of the citizens at the mercy of his unbridled soldiery, leaving them to exercise their licentious and brutal sway during several days! But those blind and cruelly capricious men (the Spaniards) rejected the mediation of England, and despatched rigorous orders to all the Generals to aggravate the war, and to punish us with more severity. The scaffolds were everywhere multiplied, and invention was racked to devise means for spreading murder, distress, and consternation.

"Thenceforth they made all possible efforts to spread division among us, to incite us to mutual extermination; they have slandered us with the most atrocious calumnies, accusing us of plotting the destruction of our holy religion, the abolition of all morality, and of introducing licentiousness of manners. They wage a religious war against us, contriving a thousand artifices to disturb and alarm the consciences of the people, making the Spanish bishops issue decrees of ecclesiastical condemnation, public excommunications, and disseminating, through the medium of some ignorant confessor, fanatical doctrines in the tribunal of penitence. By means of these religious discords they have divided families against themselves; they have caused disaffection between parents and children; they have dissolved the tender ties which unite husband and wife; they have spread rancor and implacable hatred between brothers, most endeared, and they have presumed to throw all nature into discord. They have adopted the system of murdering men indiscriminately to diminish our numbers; and, on their entry into towns, they have swept off all, even the market people, leading them to the open squares, and there shooting them one by one. The cities of Chuquisaca and Cochabamba have more than once been the theatres of these horrid slaughters.

"They have intermixed with their troops soldiers of ours whom they had taken prisoners, carrying away the officers in chains to garrisons where it is impossible to preserve health for a year; they have left others to die in their prisons of hunger and misery, and others they have forced to hard labor on the public works. They have exultingly put to death our bearers of flags of truce, and have been guilty of the blackest atrocities to our chiefs, after they had surrendered, as well as to other principal characters, in disregard of the humanity with which we treated prisoners; as a proof of it, witness the deputy Mutes of Potosi, the Captain General Pumacagua, General Augulo, and his brother Commandant Munecas, and other partisan chiefs, who were shot in cold blood, after having been prisoners for several days.

"They took a brutal pleasure in cropping the ears of the natives of the town of Villegande, and sending a basket full of them as presents to the headquarters. They afterwards burnt that town, and set fire to thirty other populous towns of Peru, and worse than the worst of savages, shutting the inhabitants up in the houses, before setting them on fire, that they might be burnt alive.

"They have not only been cruel and unsparing in their mode of murder, but they have been void of all morality and public decency, causing aged ecclesiastics and women to be lashed to a gun and publicly flogged, with the abomination of first having them stripped, and their nakedness exposed to shame, in the presence of their troops.

"They established an inquisitorial system in all these punishments; they have seized on peaceable inhabitants, and transported them across the sea to be adjudged for suspected crimes, and they have put a great number of citizens to death everywhere without accusation or the form of a trial.

"They have invented a crime of unexampled horror, in poisoning our water and provisions, when they were conquered by General Pineto at La Paz, and in return for the kindness with which he treated them, after they had surrendered at discretion, they had the barbarity to blow up the headquarters, under which they had constructed a mine, and prepared a train beforehand.

"He has branded us with the stigma of rebels the moment he returned to Madrid; he refused to listen to our complaints, or to receive our supplications; and as an act of extreme favor, he offered us a pardon. He confirmed the Viceroys, Governors, and Generals, whom he found actually glutted with carnage; he declared us guilty of a high misdemeanor, for having dared to frame a constitution for our own government, free from the control of a deified, absolute, and tyrannical Power, under which we had groaned three centuries—a measure that could be offensive only to a Prince, an enemy to justice and beneficence, and consequently unworthy to rule over us.

"He then undertook, with the aid of his Ministers, to equip large military armaments to be directed against us. He has caused numerous armies to be sent out to consummate the work of devastation, fire, and plunder.

"He has sent his Generals, with certain decrees of pardon, which they publish to deceive the ignorant, and induce them to facilitate their entrance into towns; whilst, at the same time, he has given them other secret instructions, authorizing them, as soon as they should get possession of a place, to hang, burn, confiscate, and sack; to encourage private assassinations, and to commit every species of injury in their power against the deluded beings who had confided in his pretended pardon. It is in the name of Ferdinand of Bourbon, that the heads of patriot officers, prisoners, are fixed up in the highways, that they beat and stoned to death a commandant of light troops, and that, after having killed Colonel Camugo, in the same manner, by the hands of the indecent Centeno, they cut off his head, and sent it as a present to General Pezuela, telling him it was a miracle of the Virgin of the Carmelites."

In the establishment of the independence of Spanish America, the United States have the deepest interest. He had no hesitation in asserting his firm belief, that there was no question, in the foreign policy of this country, which had ever arisen, or which he could conceive as ever occurring, in the decision of which we had so much at stake. This interest concerned our politics, our commerce, our navigation. There could not be a doubt that Spanish America, once independent, whatever might be the form of the governments established in its several parts, those governments would be animated by an American feeling, and guided by an American policy. They would obey the laws of the system of the New World, of which they would compose a part, in contradistinction to that of Europe. Without the influence of that vortex in Europe, the balance of power between its several parts, the preservation of which had so often drenched Europe in blood, America is sufficiently remote to contemplate the new wars which are to afflict that quarter of the globe, as a calm, if not a cold and indifferent spectator. In relation to those wars, the several parts of America will generally stand neutral. And as, during the period when they rage, it would be important that a liberal system of neutrality should be adopted and observed, all America will be interested in maintaining and enforcing such a system. The independence, then, of Spanish America is an interest of primary consideration. Next to that, and highly important in itself, was the consideration of the nature of their governments. That was a question, however, for themselves. They would, no doubt, adopt those kinds of governments which were best suited to their condition, best calculated for their happiness. Anxious as he was that they should be free governments, we had no right to prescribe for them. They were, and ought to be, the sole judges for themselves. He was strongly inclined to believe that they would in most, if not all, parts of their country, establish free governments. We were their great example. Of us they constantly spoke as of brothers, having a similar origin. They adopted our principles, copied our institutions, and, in some instances, employed the very language and sentiments of our revolutionary papers. [Here, Mr. C. read the following passage from the same manifesto before cited:]

"Having, then, been thus impelled by the Spaniards and their King, we have calculated all the consequences, and have constituted ourselves independent, prepared to exercise the right of nature to defend ourselves against the ravages of tyranny, at the risk of our honor, our lives, and fortune. We have sworn to the only King we acknowledge, the Supreme Judge of the World, that we will not abandon the cause of justice; that we will not suffer the country which he has given us to be buried in ruins, and inundated with blood, by the hands of the executioner," &c.

But it is sometimes said that they are too ignorant and too superstitious to admit of the existence of free government. This charge of ignorance is often urged by persons themselves actually ignorant of the real condition of that people. He denied the alleged fact of ignorance; he denied the inference from that fact, if it were true, that they wanted capacity for free government, and he refused his assent to the further conclusion, if the fact were true and the inference just, that we were to be indifferent to their fate. All the writers of the most established authority, Depons, Humboldt, and others, concur in assigning to the people of Spanish America, great quickness, genius, and particular aptitude for the acquisition of the exact sciences, and others which they have been allowed to cultivate. In astronomy, geology, mineralogy, chemistry, botany, &c., they are allowed to make distinguished proficiency. They justly boast of their Abzate, Velasquez, and Gama, and other illustrious contributors to science. They have nine Universities, and in the city of Mexico it is affirmed, by Humboldt, that there are more solid scientific establishments than in any city even of North America. He would refer to the message of the Supreme Director of La Plata, which he would hereafter have occasion to use for another purpose, as a model of fine composition of a State paper, challenging a comparison with any, the most celebrated that ever issued from the pens of Jefferson or Madison. Gentlemen would egregiously err if they formed their opinions of the present moral condition of Spanish America, from what it was under the debasing system of Spain. The eight years' revolution in which it has been engaged, has already produced a powerful effect.

Education had been attended to, and genius developed. [Here Mr. C. read a passage from the Cotential Journal, published last Summer in Great Britain, where a disposition to exaggerate on that side of the question could hardly be supposed to exist.*] The fact was not, therefore, true, that the imputed ignorance existed; but, if it did, it repeated that he disputed the inference. It was the doctrine of thrones, that man was too ignorant to govern himself. Their partisans assert this incapacity in reference to all nations; if they cannot command universal assent to the proposition, it is then demanded as to particular nations, and our pride and our presumption too often make converts of us. Mr. C. contended that it was to arraign the dispositions of Providence himself, to suppose that he had created beings incapable of governing themselves, and to be trampled on by kings. He contended that self-government was the natural government of man, and he referred to the aborigines of our own land. If he were to speculate in hypotheses unfavorable to human liberty, his should be founded rather upon the vices, refinements, or density of population. Crowded together in compact masses, even if they were philosophers, the contagion of the passions is communicated and caught, and the effect too often, he admitted, was the overthrow of liberty. Dispersed over such an immense space as that on which the people of Spanish America were spread, their physical, and he believed, also, their moral condition, both favored liberty.

*"As soon as the project of revolution arose on the shores of La Plata, genius and talent exhibited their influence; the capacity of the people became manifest, and the means of acquiring knowledge was soon made the favorite pursuit of the youth. As far as the wants, &c. the inevitable interruption of affairs have allowed, everything has been done to disseminate useful information. The liberty of the press has indeed met with some occasional checks; but in Buenos Ayres alone as many periodical works weekly issue from the press as in Spain and Portugal put together."

With regard to their superstition, he said, they worshipped the same God with us. Their prayers were offered up in their temples to the same Redeemer, whose intercession we expected to save us. All religions, united with Government, were more or less inimical to liberty. All, separated from Government, were compatible with liberty. If the people of Spanish America had not already gone as far, in religious toleration, as we had, the difference in their condition from ours should not be forgotten. Everything was progressive. And in time he hoped to see them imitating, in this respect, our example. But grant that the people of Spanish America are ignorant and incompetent for free government, to whom is that ignorance to be ascribed? Is it not to the execrable system of Spain, which she seeks again to establish and to perpetuate? So far from chilling our hearts, it ought to increase our solicitude for our unfortunate brethren. It ought to animate us to desire the redemption of the minds and the bodies of unborn millions from the brutifying effects of a system, whose tendency is to stifle the faculties of the soul, and to degrade man to the level of beasts. He would invoke the spirits of our departed fathers. Was it for yourselves only that you nobly fought? No, no. It was the chains that were forging for your posterity that made you fly to arms, and, scattering the elements of those chains to the winds, you transmitted to us the rich inheritance of liberty.

The exports of Spanish America (exclusive of the islands) are estimated, in the valuable little work of M. Torres, deserving to be better known, at about eighty-one millions of dollars. Of these more than three-fourths consist of the precious metals; the residue are cocoa, coffee, cochineal, sugar, and some other articles. No nation ever offered richer commodities in exchange. It was of no material consequence that we produced but little that Spanish America wanted. Commerce, as it actually exists, in the hands of maritime States, was no longer confined to a mere barter, between any two States, of their respective productions. It rendered tributary to its interests the commodities of all quarters of the world. So that a rich American cargo, or the contents of an American commercial warehouse, presented you with whatever was rare or valuable in every part of the globe. Commerce was not to be judged by its results in transactions with one nation only. Unfavorable balances existing with one State are made up by contrary balances with other States. And its true value should be tested by the totality of its operations. Our greatest trade—that with Great Britain—judged by the amount of what we sold for her consumption, and what we bought of her for ours, would be pronounced ruinous. But the unfavorable balance was covered by the profits of trade with other nations. We may safely trust to the daring enterprise of our merchants. The precious metals are in South America, and they will command the articles wanted in South America which will purchase them. Our navigation will be benefited by the transportation, and our country will realize the mercantile profits. Already the item in our exports of American manufactures is respectable. They go chiefly to the West Indies and to Spanish America. This item is constantly augmenting. And he would again, as he had on another occasion, ask gentlemen to elevate themselves to the actual importance and greatness of our Republic; to reflect, like true American statesmen, that we were not legislating for the present day only; and to contemplate this country in its march to true greatness, when millions on millions will be added to our population, and when the increased productive industry will furnish an infinite variety of fabrics for foreign consumption, in order to supply our own wants. The distribution of the precious metals has hitherto been principally made through the circuitous channel of Cadiz. No one can foresee all the effects which will result from a direct distribution of them from the mines which produce them. One of these effects will probably be to give us the entire command of the India trade. The advantage we have on the map of the world over Europe, in that respect, is prodigious. Again, if England, persisting in her colonial monopoly, continued to occlude her ports in the West Indies to us, and we should, as he contended we ought, meet her system by a countervailing measure, Venezuela, New Grenada, and other parts of Spanish America, would afford us all that we get from the British West Indies. He confessed that he despaired, for the present, of our adopting that salutary measure. It was proposed at the last session, and postponed. He saw, and he owned it with infinite regret, a tone and a feeling in the councils of the country infinitely below that which belonged to the country. It was, perhaps, the moral consequence of the exertions of the late war. We are alarmed at dangers, we know not what, by spectres conjured up by our own vivid imaginations.

The West India bill is brought up. We shrug our shoulders, talk of restrictions, non-intercourse, embargo, commercial warfare, make long faces, and—postpone the bill. The time will, however, come—must come—when this country will not submit to a commerce with the British colonies upon the terms which England alone prescribes. And he repeated that, when it arrived, Spanish America would afford us an ample substitute. Then, as to our navigation, gentlemen should recollect that, if reasoning from past experience were safe, for the future our great commercial rival will be in war a greater number of years than she will be in peace. Whenever she shall be at war, and we are in peace, our navigation, being free from the risks and insurance incident to war, we shall engross almost the whole transportation of the Spanish American commerce. For he did not believe that that country would ever have a considerable marine. Mexico, the most populous part of it, had but two ports, La Vera Cruz and Acapulco, and neither of them very good. Spanish America had not the elements to construct a marine. It wanted, and must always want, hardy seamen. He did not believe that, in the present improved state of navigation, any nations so far South would ever make a figure as maritime Powers. If Carthage and Rome, in ancient times, and some other States of a later period, occasionally made great exertions on the water, it must be recollected that they were principally on a small theatre, and in a totally different state of the art of navigation, or when there was no competition from northern States.

He was aware that, in opposition to the interest which he had been endeavoring to manifest that this country had in the independence of Spanish America, it was contended that we should find that country a great rival in agricultural productions. There was something so narrow and selfish, and grovelling in this argument, if founded in fact, something so unworthy the magnanimity of a great and a generous people, that he confessed he had scarcely patience to notice it. But it was not true to any extent. Of the eighty odd millions of exports, only about one million and a half consisted of an article which might come into competition with us, and that was cotton. The tobacco which Spain received from her colonies was chiefly produced in her islands. Breadstuffs could nowhere be raised and brought to market in any amount materially affecting us. The table lands of Mexico, owing to their elevation, were, it is true, well adapted to the culture of grain; but the expense and difficulty of getting it to the Gulf of Mexico, and the action of the intense heat at La Vera Cruz, the only port of exportation, must always prevent Mexico from being an alarming competitor. Spanish America was capable of producing articles so much more valuable than those which we raised, that it was not probable they would abandon a more profitable for a less advantageous culture, to come into competition with us. The West India islands were well adapted to the raising cotton; and yet the more valuable culture of coffee and sugar was constantly preferred. Again: Providence had so ordered it, that with regard to countries producing articles apparently similar, there was some peculiarity, resulting from climate, from soil, or from some other cause, that gave to each an appropriate place in the general wants and consumption of mankind. The southern part of the continent, La Plata and Chili, was too remote to rival us.

The immense country, watered by the Mississippi and its branches, had a peculiar interest, which he trusted he should be excused for noticing. Having but the single vent of New Orleans, for all the surplus produce of their industry, it was quite evident that they would have a greater security for enjoying the advantages of that outlet, if the independence of Mexico upon any European Power were effected. Such a Power, owning at the same time Cuba, the great key of the Gulf of Mexico, and all the shores of that Gulf, with the exception of the portion between the Perido and the Rio del Norte, must have a powerful command over our interests. Spain, it was true, was not a dangerous neighbor at present, but, in the vicissitudes of States, her power might be again resuscitated.

Mr. C. continued—having shown that the cause of the patriots was just, and that we had a great interest in its successful issue, he would next inquire what course of policy it became us to adopt. He had already declared that to be one of strict and impartial neutrality. It was not necessary for their interest, it was not expedient for our own, that we should take part in the war. All they demanded of us was a just neutrality. It was compatible with this pacific policy—it was required by it, that we should recognize any established Government, if there were, any established Government in Spanish America. Recognition alone, without aid, was no just cause of war. With aid it was, not because of the recognition, but because of the aid, as aid without recognition was cause of war. The truth of these propositions he would maintain upon principle, by the practice of other States, and by the usage of our own. There was no common tribunal among the nations, to pronounce upon the fact of the sovereignty of a new State. Each Power must and does judge for itself. It was an attribute of sovereignty so to judge. A nation, in exerting this incontestable right—in pronouncing upon the independence in fact of a new State, takes no part in the war. It gives neither men, nor ships, nor money. It merely pronounces that in so far as it may be necessary to institute any relations or to support any intercourse, with the new Power, that Power is capable of maintaining those relations and authorizing that intercourse.—Martens and other publicists lay down these principles.

When the United Provinces formerly severed themselves from Spain, it was about eighty years before their independence was finally recognised by Spain. Before that recognition, the United Provinces had been received by all the rest of Europe into the family of nations. It is true that a war broke out between Philip and Elizabeth, but it proceeded from the aid which she determined to give and did give to Holland. In no instance he believed could it be shown, from authentic history, that Spain made war upon any Power, on the sole ground that such Power had acknowledged the independence of the United Provinces.

In the case of our own Revolution, it was not until after France had given us aid, and had determined to enter into a treaty of alliance with us—a treaty by which she guaranteed our independence, that England declared war. Holland also was charged by England with favoring our cause, and deviating from the line of strict neutrality. And, when it was perceived that she was, moreover, about to enter into a treaty with us, England declared war. Even if it were shown that a proud, haughty, and powerful nation, like England, had made war, upon other provinces, on the ground of a mere recognition, the single example could not alter the public law, or shake the strength of a clear principle.

But what had been our own uniform practice? We had constantly proceeded on the principle, that the government de facto was that which we could alone notice. Whatever form of government any society of people adopt; whoever they acknowledge as their sovereign, we consider that government or that sovereign as the one to be acknowledged by us. We have invariably abstained from assuming a right to decide in favor of the sovereign de jure, and against the sovereign de facto. That is a question for the nation in which it arises to determine. And, so far as we are concerned, the sovereign de facto the sovereign de jure. Our own revolution stands on the basis of the right of a people to change their rulers. He did not maintain that every immature revolution—every usurper, before his power was consolidated, was to be acknowledged by us; but that as soon as stability and order were maintained, no matter by whom, we always had considered and ought to consider the actual as the true Government. General Washington, Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Madison, had all, whilst they were respectively Presidents, acted on these principles.

In the case of the French Republic, General Washington did not wait until some of the crowned heads of Europe should set him the example of acknowledging it, but accredited a Minister at once. And it is remarkable that he was received before the Government of the Republic was considered as established. It will be found, in Marshall's Life of Washington, that, when it was understood that a Minister from the French Republic was about to present himself, President Washington submitted a number of questions to his Cabinet for their consideration and advice, one of which was, whether, upon the reception of the Minister, he should be notified that America would suspend the execution of the treaties between the two countries until France had an established Government. General Washington did not stop to inquire whether the descendants of St. Louis were to be considered as the legitimate sovereigns of France, and if the revolution was to be regarded as unauthorized resistance to their sway. He saw France, in fact, under the government of those who had subverted the Throne of the Bourbons, and he acknowledged the actual Government. During Mr. Jefferson's and Mr. Madison's Administrations, when the Cortes of Spain and Joseph Bonaparte respectively contended for the Crown, those enlightened statesmen said, we will receive a Minister from neither party; settle the question between yourselves, and we will acknowledge the party that prevails. We have nothing to do with your feuds; whoever all Spain acknowledges as her sovereign, is the only sovereign with whom we can maintain any relations. Mr. Jefferson, it is understood, considered whether he should not receive a Minister from both parties, and finally decided against it because of the inconveniences, to this country, which might result from the double representation of another Power. As soon as the French armies were expelled from the Peninsula, Mr. Madison, still acting on the principle of the government de facto, received the present Minister from Spain. During all the phases of the French Government—Republic, Directory, Consuls, Consul for life, Emperor, King, Emperor again, King—our Government has uniformly received the Minister.

If, then, there be an established Government in Spanish America, deserving to rank among the nations, we were morally and politically bound to acknowledge it, unless we renounced all the principles which ought to guide, and which hitherto had guided, our councils. Mr. C. then undertook to show, that the united provinces of the Rio de la Plata was such a Government. Its limits, he said, extending from the South Atlantic ocean to the Pacific, embraced a territory equal to that of the United States, certainly equal to it, exclusive of Louisiana. Its population was about three millions, more than equal to ours at the commencement of our Revolution. That population was a hardy, enterprising, and gallant population. The establishments of Montevideo and Buenos Ayres had, during different periods of their history, been attacked by the French, Dutch, Danes, Portuguese, English, and Spanish; and such was the martial character of the people, that, in every instance, the attack had been repulsed. In 1807, General Whitlocke, commanding a powerful English army, was admitted, under the guise of a friend, into Buenos Ayres, and, as soon as he was supposed to have demonstrated inimical designs, he was driven by the native and unaided force of Buenos Ayres from the country. Buenos Ayres had, during now nearly eight years, been, in point of fact, in the enjoyment of self-government. The capital, containing more than sixty thousand inhabitants, has never been once lost. As early as 1811, the Regency of Old Spain made war upon Buenos Ayres, and the consequence subsequently was, the capture of a Spanish army in Montevideo, equal to that of Burgoyne. This Government has now in excellent discipline, three well appointed armies, with the most abundant material of war; the army of Chili, the army of Peru, and the army of Buenos Ayres. The first, under San Martin, has conquered Chili; the second is penetrating in a Northwestern direction from Buenos Ayres, into the vice-royalty of Peru; and, according to the last accounts, had reduced the ancient seat of empire of the Incas. The third remains at Buenos Ayres to oppose any force which Spain may send against it. To show the condition of the country in July last, Mr. C. again called the attention of the Committee to the message of the Supreme Director, delivered to the Congress of the United Provinces.

It was a paper of the same authentic character with the speech of the King of England on opening his Parliament, or the Message of the President of the United States, at the commencement of Congress. [Mr. C. here read the following passages:]

"The army of this capital was organized at the same time with those of the Andes and of the interior; the regular force has been nearly doubled; the militia has made great progress in military discipline; our slave population has been formed into battalions, and taught the military art as far as is consistent with their condition. The capital is under no apprehension that an army of ten thousand men can shake its liberties, and, should the Peninsularians send against us thrice that number, ample provision has been made to receive them.

"Our navy has been fostered in all its branches. The scarcity of means, under which we labored until now, has not prevented us from undertaking very considerable operations, with respect to the national vessels; all of them have been repaired, and others have been purchased and armed for the defence of our coasts and rivers; provisions have been made, should necessity require it, for arming many more, so that the enemy will not find himself secure from our reprisals even upon the ocean.

"Our military force, at every point which it occupies, seems to be animated by the same spirit; its tactics are uniform, and have undergone a rapid improvement from the science of experience, which it has borrowed from warlike nations.

"Our arsenals have been replenished with arms, and a sufficient store of cannon and munitions of war has been provided to maintain the contest for many years; and this, after having supplied articles of every description to those districts, which have not, as yet, come into the Union, but whose connexion with us has been only intercepted by reason of our past misfortunes.

"Our legions daily receive considerable augmentations from new levies; all our preparations have been made, as though we were about to enter upon the contest anew. Until now, the vastness of our resources were unknown to us, and our enemies may contemplate, with deep mortification and despair, the present flourishing state of these provinces after so many devastations.

"Whilst thus occupied in providing for our safety within, and preparing for assaults from without, other objects of solid interest have not been neglected, and which hitherto were thought to oppose insurmountable obstacles.

"Our system of finance had hitherto been on a footing entirely inadequate to the unfailing supply of our wants, and still more to the liquidation of the immense debt which had been contracted in former years. An unremitted application to this subject has enabled me to create the means of satisfying the creditors of the State, who had already abandoned their debts as lost, as well as to devise a fixed mode, by which the taxes may be made to fall equally and indirectly on the whole mass of our population; it is not the least merit of this operation, that it has been effected in despite of the writings by which it was attacked, and which are but little creditable to the intelligence and good intentions of their authors. At no other period have the public exigencies been so punctually sup-pled, nor have more important works been undertaken.

The people, moreover, have been relieved from many burdens, which being partial, or confined to particular classes, had occasioned vexation and disgust. Other vexations, scarcely less grievous, will, by degrees, be also suppressed, avoiding, as far as possible, a recurrence to loans, which have drawn after them the most fatal consequences to States. Should we, however, be compelled to resort to such expedients the lenders will not see themselves in danger of losing their advances.

Many undertakings have been set on foot for the advancement of the general prosperity. Such has been the re-establishing of the college, heretofore named San Carlos, but hereafter to be called the Union of the South, as a point designated for the dissemination of learning to the youth of every part of the State, on the most extensive scale, for the attainment of which object the Government is at the present moment engaged in putting in practice every possible diligence. It will not be long before these nurseries will flourish, in which the liberal and exact sciences will be cultivated, in which the hearts of those young men will be formed, who are destined, at some future day, to add new splendor to our country.

Such has been the establishment of a military depot on our frontier, with its spacious magazine, a necessary measure to guard us from future dangers, a work which does more honor to the prudent foresight of our country, as it was undertaken in the moment of its prosperous fortunes; a measure which must give more occasion for reflection to our enemies, than they can impose upon us by their boasting.

Fellow-citizens, we owe our unhappy reverses and calamities to the depraving system of our ancient metropolis, which, in condemning us to the obscurity and opprobrium of the most degraded destiny, has sown with thorns the path that conducts us to liberty. Tell that metropolis that even she may glory in your work! Already have you cleared all the rocks, escaped every danger, and conducted these provinces to the flourishing condition in which we now behold them. Let the enemies of your name contemplate with despair the energies of your virtues, and let the nations acknowledge that you already appertain to their illustrious rank. Let us felicitate ourselves on the blessings we have already obtained, and let us show to the world that we have learned to profit by the experience of our past misfortunes."

Mr. CLAY continued—there was a spirit of bold confidence running through this fine State paper which nothing but conscious strength could communicate. Their armies, their magazines, their finances, were on the most solid and respectable footing. And, amidst all the cares of war, and those incident to the consolidation of their new institutions, leisure was found to promote the interests of science, and the education of the rising generation. It was true, that the first part of the message portrayed scenes of difficulty and commotion, the usual attendants upon revolution. The very avowal of their troubles manifested, however, that they were subdued. And what State, passing through the agitations of a great revolution, was free from them? We had our intrigues, our factions. More than once were the affections of the country, and the confidence of our councils, attempted to be shaken in the great Father of our liberties. Not a Spanish bayonet remains within the immense extent of the territories of La Plata to contest the authority of the actual Government. It is free—it is independent—it is sovereign. It manages the interests of the society that submits to its sway. It is capable of maintaining the relations between that society and other nations.

Are we not bound, then, upon our own principles, to acknowledge this new Republic? If we do not, who will? Are we to expect, that Kings will set us the example of acknowledging the only Republic on earth, except our own? We receive, promptly receive, a Minister from whatever King sends us one. From the great Powers and the little Powers, we accredit Ministers. We do more: we hasten to reciprocate the compliment; and anxious to manifest our gratitude for royal civility, we send for a Minister (as in the instance of Sweden and the Netherlands) of the lowest grade, one of the highest rank recognised by our laws. We were the natural head of the American family. He would not intermeddle in the affairs of Europe. We wisely kept aloof from their broils. He would not even intermeddle in those of other parts of America, farther than to exert the incontestable rights appertaining to us as a free, sovereign, and independent Power; and, he contended, that the accrediting of a Minister from the new Republic was such a right. We were bound to receive their Minister, if we meant to be really neutral. If the Royal belligerent were represented and heard at our Government, the Republican belligerent ought also to be heard. Otherwise, one party would be in the condition of the poor patriots who were tried ex parte the other day in the Supreme Court, without counsel, without friends. Give M. Onís his congé, or receive the Republican Minister. Unless you do so, your neutrality is nominal.

Mr. C. next proceeded to inquire into the consequences of a recognition of the new Republic. Will it involve us in war with Spain? He had shown, he trusted, successfully shown, that it was no just cause of war to Spain. Being no cause of war, we had no right to expect that war would ensue. If Spain, without cause, would make war, she may make it whether we do or do not acknowledge the Republic. But she would not, because she could not make war against us. He called the attention of the committee to a report of the Minister of the Hacienda to the King of Spain, presented about eight months ago. A more beggarly account of empty boxes, Mr. C. said, was never rendered. The picture of Mr. Dallas, sketched in his celebrated report during the late war, may be contemplated without emotion, after surveying that of Mr. Gary. The expenses of the current year required 830,267,829 of reals, and the deficit of the income is represented as 233,140,932 of reals. This, besides an immense mass of unliquidated debt, which the Minister acknowledges the utter inability of the country to pay, although bound in honor to redeem it. He states, that the vassals of the King are totally unable to submit to any new taxes, and the country is without credit, so as to render anticipation by loans wholly impracticable. Mr. Gary appears to be a virtuous man, who exhibits frankly the naked truth; and yet such a Minister acknowledges, that the decorum due to one single family, that of the Monarch, does not admit, in this critical condition of his country, any reduction of the enormous sum of upwards of 56,000,000 of reals, set apart to defray the expenses of that family! He states, that a foreign war would be the greatest of all calamities, and one which, being unable to provide for it, they ought to employ every possible means to avert. He proposed some considerable contribution from the clergy, and the whole body was instantly in an uproar. Indeed, Mr. C. had no doubt, that, surrounded as Mr. Gary was, by corruption, by intrigue, and folly, and imbecility, he would be compelled to retire, if he had not already been dismissed, from a post for which he had too much integrity. It had been now about four years since the restoration of Ferdinand; and if, during that period, the whole energies of the monarchy had been directed unsuccessfully against the weakest and most vulnerable of all the American possessions, Venezuela, how was it possible for Spain to encounter the difficulties of a new war with this country? Morillo had been sent out with one of the finest armies that had ever left the shores of Europe—consisting of ten thousand men, chosen from all the veterans who had fought in the Peninsula. It had subsequently been reinforced with about three thousand more. And yet, during the last Summer, it was reduced, by the sword and the climate, to about four thousand effective men. And Venezuela, containing a population of only about one million, of which near two-thirds were persons of color, remained unsubdued. The little island of Margaritta, whose population was less than twenty thousand inhabitants—a population fighting for liberty with more than Roman valor—had compelled that army to retire upon the main. Spain, by the late accounts, appeared to be deliberating upon the necessity of resorting to that measure of conscription, for which Bonaparte had been so much abused. The effect of a war with this country would be to insure success, beyond all doubt, to the cause of American independence. Those parts even, over which Spain has some prospect of maintaining her dominion, would probably be put in jeopardy. Such a war would be attended with the immediate and certain loss of Florida. Commanding the Gulf of Mexico, as we should be enabled to do by our navy, blockading the port of Havana, the port of La Vera Cruz, and the coast of Terra Firma, and throwing munitions of war into Mexico, Cuba would be menaced—Mexico emancipated—and Morillo's army deprived of supplies, now drawn principally from this country through the Havana, compelled to surrender. The war, he verily believed, would be terminated in less than two years, supposing no other Power to interpose.

Will the allies interfere? If, by the exertion of an unquestionable attribute of a sovereign Power, we should give no just cause of war to Spain herself, how could it be pretended that we should furnish even a specious pretext to the allies for making war upon us? On what ground could they attempt to justify a rupture with us, for the exercise of a right which we hold in common with them, and with every other independent State? But, we have a surer guarantee against their hostility, in their interests. That all the allies, who have any foreign commerce, have an interest in the independence of Spanish America, was perfectly evident.

On what ground, Mr. C. again asked, was it likely, then, that they would support Spain, in opposition to their own decided interest? To crush the spirit of revolt, and prevent the progress of free principles? Nations, like individuals, do not sensibly feel and seldom act upon dangers which are remote, either in time or place. Of Spanish America, but little is known by the great body of the population of Europe. Even of this country, the most astonishing ignorance prevails there. Those European statesmen who were acquainted with the country would reflect, that, tossed by a great revolution, it would most probably constitute four or five several nations, and that the ultimate modification of all their various Governments was by no means absolutely certain. But, Mr. C. said, he entertained no doubt that the principle of cohesion among the allies was gone; it was annihilated in the memorable battle of Waterloo. When the question was, whether one should engross all, a common danger united all. How long was it, even with a clear perception of that danger, before an effective coalition could be formed! How often did one Power stand by unmoved and indifferent to the fate of its neighbor, although the destruction of that neighbor removed the only barrier to an attack upon itself! No; the consummation of the cause of the allies was—and all history and all experience would prove it—the destruction of the alliance. The principle was totally changed. It was no longer a common struggle against the colossal power of Bonaparte, but it became a common scramble for the spoils of his Empire. There may indeed be one or two points on which a common interest still exists—such as the convenience of subsisting their armies on the vitals of poor, suffering France—but, as for action—for new enterprises—there was no principle of unity; there could be no accordance of interests or of views among them.

What was the condition in which Europe was left, after all its efforts? It was divided into two great Powers—one having the undisputed command of the land, the other of the water. Paris was transferred to St. Petersburg, and the navies of Europe were at the bottom of the sea, or concentrated in the ports of England. Russia—that huge land animal, awing by the dread of her vast power all continental Europe—was seeking to encompass the Porte, and constituting herself the kraken of the ocean, was anxious to lave her enormous sides in the more genial waters of the Mediterranean. It was said, he knew, that she had indicated a disposition to take part with Spain. No such thing. She had sold some worm-eaten, decayed, fir-built ships, to Spain, but the crews which navigated them were to return from the port of delivery, and the quid she was to get, he believed, to be the Island of Minorca, in conformity with the cardinal point of her policy. France was greatly interested in whatever would extend her commerce and regenerate her marine, and consequently, more than any other Power of Europe, England alone excepted, was concerned in the independence of Spanish America. He did not despair of France, so long as France had a legislative body, collected from all its parts—the great repository of its wishes and its will. Already had that body manifested a spirit of considerable independence; and those who were conversant with French history, knew what magnanimous stands had been made by the Parliaments—bodies of limited extent—against the Royal prerogative, would be able to appreciate justly the moral force of such a legislative body. While it exists, the true interests of France will be cherished and pursued, on points of foreign policy, in opposition to the pride and interests of the Bourbon family; if the actual dynasty, impelled by this pride, should seek to subserve these interests.

England finds that, after all her exertions, she is everywhere despised on the Continent; her maritime power viewed with jealousy; her commerce subjected to the most onerous restrictions; selfishness imputed to all her policy. All the accounts from France represent that every party, Bonapartists, Jacobins, Royalists, Modérés, Ultras, all burn with indignation towards England, and pant for an opportunity to avenge themselves on the Power to whom they ascribe all their disasters. [Here Mr. C. read a part of a letter which he had just received from an intelligent friend at Paris, and which composed only a small portion of a mass of evidence to the same effect, which had come under his notice.] It was impossible, he said, that with Powers, between whom so much cordial dislike, so much incongruity existed, there could be any union or concert. Whilst the free principles of the French Revolution remained; those principles which were so alarming to the stability of thrones, there never had been any successful or cordial union; coalition after coalition, wanting this spirit of union, was swept away by the overwhelming power of France. It was not until after those principles were abandoned and Bonaparte had erected on their ruins his stupendous fabric of universal empire—not, indeed, until after the frowns of Heaven favored the cause of Europe, that an effective coalition was formed. No, said Mr. C., the complaisance inspired in the allies, from unexpected if not undeserved success, might keep them nominally together; but, for all purposes of united and combined action, the alliance was gone; and he did not believe in the chimera of their crusading against the independence of a country whose liberation would essentially promote all their respective interests.

But the question of the interposition of the allies, in the event of our recognising the new Republic, resolved itself into a question whether England, in such event, would make war upon us? If it could be shown that England would not, or that, if they should, in which case England would most probably support the cause of America, it would be a war without the maritime ability to maintain it. He contended that England was alike restrained by her honor and by her interest from waging war against us, and consequently against Spanish America also, for an acknowledgment of the independence of the new State. England has encouraged and fomented the revolt of the colonies as early as June, 1797. Sir Thomas Picton, Governor of Trinidad, in virtue of orders from the British Minister of Foreign Affairs, issued a proclamation, in which he expressly assures the inhabitants of Terra Firma, that the British Government will aid in establishing their independence.* In prosecution of the same object Great Britain defrayed the expenses of the famous expedition of Miranda.

England, in 1811, when she was in the most intimate relations with Spain, then struggling against the French power, assumed the attitude of a mediator between the colonies and the Peninsula. The terms on which she conceived her mediation could alone be effectual were rejected by the Cortes at the lowest state of the Spanish power. Among these terms England required for the colonies a perfect freedom of commerce, allowing only some degree of preference to Spain; that the appointment of Viceroy and Governors should be made indiscriminately from Spanish Americans and Spaniards; and that the interior government, and every branch of public administration should be intrusted to the Cabildo or Municipalities, &c. If Spain, when Spain was almost reduced to the island of St. Leon, then rejected those conditions, would she now consent to them, amounting, as they do, substantially to the independence of Spanish America? If England, devoted as she was at that time to the cause of the Peninsula, even then thought those terms due to the colonies, would she now, when no particular motive exists for cherishing the Spanish power, and after the ingratitude with which Spain has treated her, think that the colonies ought to submit to less favorable conditions? And would not England stand disgraced in the eyes of the whole world, if, after having

* The following is the passage read: "With regard to the hope you entertain of raising the spirits of those persons with whom you are in correspondence, towards encouraging the inhabitants to resist the oppressive authority of their Government, I have little more to say than that they may be certain that whenever they are in that disposition, they may receive at your hands all the succors to be expected from His Britannic Majesty, be it with forces or with arms and ammunition to any extent; with the assurance that the views of His Britannic Majesty go no further than to secure to them their independence."

abetted and excited a revolution, she should now attempt to reduce the colonies to unconditional submission, or should make war upon us for acknowledging that independence which she has herself sought to establish?

No guarantee for the conduct of nations or individuals ought to be stronger than that which honor imposes; but for those who would put no confidence in its obligations, he had an argument to urge of more conclusive force. It was founded upon the interest of England. Excluded almost as she is from the Continent, the commerce of America, South and North, is worth to her more than the commerce of the residue of the world. That, to all Spanish America, had been alone estimated at fifteen millions sterling. Its aggregate value to Spanish America and the United States might be fairly stated at upwards of one hundred millions of dollars. The effect of a war with the two countries would be to divest England of this great interest, at a moment when she is anxiously engaged in repairing the ravages of the European war. Looking to the present moment only, and merely to the interests of commerce, England is concerned more than even this country in the success of the cause of independence in Spanish America. The reduction of the Spanish power in America has been the constant and favorite aim of her policy for two centuries; she must blot out her whole history; reverse the maxims of all her illustrious statesmen; extinguish the spirit of commerce which animates, directs, and controls all her movements, before she can render herself accessory to the subjugation of Spanish America. No commercial advantages which Spain might offer her by treaty could possess the security for her trade which independence would communicate. The one would be most probably of limited duration, and liable to violation from policy, from interest, or from caprice. The other would be as permanent as that independence. That he did not mistake the views of the British cabinet, the recent proclamation of the Prince Regent, he thought, proved. The Committee would remark that that document did not describe the patriots as rebels or insurgents, but, using a term which he had no doubt had been well weighed, it declared the existence of a "state of warfare." And with regard to English subjects, who were in the armies of Spain, although they had entered the service without restriction as to their military duties, it required that they should not take part against the colonies. The subjects of England freely supplied the patriots with arms and ammunition, and an honorable friend of his (Mr. JOHNSON) had just received a letter from one of the West India islands, stating the arrival there from England of the skeletons of three regiments, with many of the men to fill them, destined to aid the patriots. In the Quarterly Review, of November last, a journal devoted to the Ministry, and a work of the highest authority, as it respects their views, the policy of neutrality is declared and supported as the true policy of England; and that, even if the United States were to take part in the war; and Spain is expressly notified that she cannot and must not expect aid from England.* In the case of the struggle between Spain and her colonies, England, for once at least, had manifested a degree of wisdom highly deserving our imitation, but unfortunately the very reverse of her course had been pursued by us. She had so conducted, by operating upon the hopes of the two parties, as to keep on the best terms with both; to enjoy all the advantages of the rich commerce of both. We had, by a neutrality bill containing unprecedented features; and still more by a late Executive measure, to say the least of it, of doubtful Constitutional character, contrived to dissatisfy both parties. We had the confidence of neither Spain nor the colonies.

Mr. C. said, it remained for him to defend the proposition which he meant to submit, from an objection which he had heard intimated, that it interfered with the duties assigned to the Executive branch. On this subject he felt the greatest solicitation; for no man more than himself respected the preservation of the independence of the several departments of Government, in the Constitutional orbits which were prescribed to them. It was his favorite maxim that each, acting within its proper sphere, should move with its Constitutional independence, and under its Constitutional responsibility, without influence from any other. He was perfectly aware, that the Constitution of the United States, and he admitted the proposition, in its broadest sense, confided to the Executive the reception, and the

* "In arguing, therefore, for the advantages of a strict neutrality, we must enter an early protest against any imputations of hostility to the cause of genuine freedom, or of any passion for despotism and the inquisition. We are no more the panegyrists of legitimate authority in all times, circumstances, and situations, than we are advocates for revolution in the abstract," &c. "But it has been plausibly asserted, that by abstaining from interference in the affairs of South America we are surrendering to the United States all the advantages which might be secured to ourselves from this revolution; that we are assisting to increase the trade and power of a nation which alone can ever be the maritime rival of England. It appears to us extremely doubtful whether any advantage, commercial or political, can be lost to England by a neutral conduct; and it must be observed that the United States themselves have given every public proof of their intention to pursue the same line of policy. But, admitting that this conduct is nothing more than a decent pretext; or admitting, still further, that they will afford to the independents direct and open assistance, our view of the case would remain precisely the same," &c. "To persevere in force unaided, is to miscalculate her (Spain's) own resources, even to infatuation. To expect the aid of an ally in such a cause would, if that ally were England, be to suppose this country as forgetful of its own past history as of its immediate interests and duties. Far better would it be for Spain, instead of calling for our aid, to profit by our experience; and to substitute, ere it be too late, for efforts like those by which the North American colonies were lost to this country, the conciliatory measures by which they might have been retained."

deputation of Ministers. But, in relation to the latter operation, Congress had a concurrent will in the power of providing for the payment of their salaries. The instrument nowhere said, or implied, that the Executive act of sending a Minister to a foreign country should precede the legislative act which shall provide for the payment of his salary. And, in point of fact, our statutory code was full of examples of legislative action prior to Executive action, both in relation to the deputation of agents abroad, and to the subject-matter of treaties. Perhaps the act of sending a Minister abroad, and the act providing for the allowance of his salary ought to be simultaneous; but if, in the order of precedence, there were more reason on the one side than on the other, he thought it was in favor of the priority of the legislative act, as the safer depositary of power. When a Minister is sent abroad, although the Legislature may be disposed to think his mission useless, although, if previously consulted, they would have said they would not consent to pay such a Minister, the duty is delicate and painful to refuse to pay the salary promised to him whom the Executive has even unnecessarily sent abroad. Mr. C. illustrated his ideas by the existing missions to Sweden and to the Netherlands. He had no hesitation in saying, that if we had not Ministers of the first grade there, and if the Legislature were asked, prior to sending them, whether it would consent to pay Ministers of that grade, that he would not, and he believed Congress would not, consent to pay them.

If it be urged that, by avowing our willingness, in a legislative act, to pay a Minister not yet sent, and whom the President may think it improper to send abroad, we operate upon the President by all the force of our opinion; it may be retorted, that when we are called upon to pay any Minister, sent under similar circumstances, we are operated upon by all the force of the President's opinion. The true theory of our Government at least supposes that each of the two departments, acting on its proper Constitutional responsibility, will decide according to its best judgment, under all the circumstances of the case. If we make the previous appropriation, we act upon our Constitutional responsibility, and the President afterwards will proceed upon his. And so if he make the previous appointment. We have a right, after a Minister is sent abroad, and we are called upon to pay him, and we ought to deliberate upon the propriety of his mission—we may and ought to grant or withhold his salary. If this power of deliberation is conceded subsequent to the deputation of the Minister, it must exist prior to that deputation. Whenever we so deliberate, we deliberate under our Constitutional responsibility. Pass the amendment he proposed, and it would be passed under that responsibility. Then the President, when he deliberated on the propriety of the mission, would act under his Constitutional responsibility. Each branch of Government, moving in its proper sphere, would act with as much freedom for the influence of the other as was practically attainable.

There was great reason, Mr. C. contended, from the peculiar character of the American Government, in there being a perfect understanding between the legislative and Executive branches, in relation to the acknowledgment of a new Power. Everywhere else the power of declaring war resided with the Executive. Here it was deposited with the Legislature. If, contrary to his opinion, there were even a risk that the acknowledgment of a new State might lead to war, it was advisable that the step should not be taken, without a previous knowledge of the will of the war-making branch. He was disposed to give to the President all the confidence which he must derive from the unequivocal expression of our will. This expression he knew might be given in the form of an abstract resolution, declaratory of that will; but he preferred, at this time, proposing an act of practical legislation. And if he had been so fortunate as to communicate to the Committee, in anything like that degree of strength in which he entertained them, the convictions that the cause of the patriots was just; that the character of the war, as waged by Spain, should induce us to wish them success; that we had a great interest in that success; that this interest, as well as our neutral attitude, required us to acknowledge any established Government in Spanish America; that the united provinces of the river Plata was such a Government; that we might safely acknowledge its independence, without danger of war from Spain, from the allies, or from England; and that, without unconstitutional interference with the Executive power, with peculiar fitness, we might express, in an act of appropriation, our sentiments, leaving him to the exercise of a just and responsible discretion, he hoped the Committee would adopt the proposition which he now had the honor of presenting to them, after a respectful tender of his acknowledgments for their attention and kindness, during, he feared, the tedious period he had been so unprofitably trespassing upon their patience. He offered the following amendment to the bill:

"For one year's salary, and an outfit to a Minister to the United Provinces of the Rio de la Plata, the salary to commence, and the outfit to be paid whenever the President shall deem it expedient to send a Minister to the said United Provinces, a sum not exceeding eighteen thousand dollars."

When Mr. CLAY had concluded, Mr. FORSYTH said, that before entering into the examination of the subject before the Committee, he would detain them for a moment by a remark or two on a suggestion that had fallen from the Speaker, so remotely connected with the question, that he should probably forget it if he omitted to notice it then. It had been said that Ministers were sent from the United States to all the crowned heads in Europe who had Ministers here. A Chargé d'Affaires to the United States was reciprocated by a Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court from whence he came, and the Courts of Sweden, Holland, and Prussia, had been particularly named. The last is one to which a Minister was expected to be sent, particular information of which fact Mr. F. was supposed to possess. But for this personal allusion he should not have felt himself compelled to refer to this subject. [Mr. CLAY explained.] Mr. F. understood perfectly well that there was no unfriendly spirit in the remark, it was an allusion to an event which was expected to occur, but upon what foundation he had been at a loss to conjecture. Certain it was, he had no intimation that this or any other diplomatic appointment would be offered to him, and it was equally certain that he had not solicited any. An idle rumor was in circulation that he was to be sent abroad, where, the persons circulating it, had not determined. He hoped to be consulted as to the place of exile, when he was to be sent into honorable banishment. The Administration had not, he believed, determined to send a Minister to Prussia, of any grade. There was a mistake as to the fact, in the case of Holland. The Government of the Netherlands had sent a Minister of the first grade to the United States, before Mr. Eustis went to the Hague. At present there was only a Chargé here, and it was altogether probable that the interest of the United States would not require a representative of a different character in the Netherlands. The appointments to the Hague and to Sweden, had been made by Mr. Madison, under circumstances requiring them. With regard to Sweden, the motive for the original appointment was well known. It was made at a period when, from the peculiar situation of Europe, Sweden was an important Power. She was the key-stone of the arch of the great confederation against France, and it was part of our policy at that period to stand well with all the Powers in the north of Europe. The restoration of peace certainly rendered this mission of minor importance; and when the Minister of the United States came home, it was not expected that he would again return to fix his official residence at Stockholm. Why he returned to Sweden was as well known to the honorable Speaker as to any member of the House. Mr. F. was confident that he would not remain there.

Was the importance of the amendment proposed to be estimated by the interest it excited, and the extraordinary manner in which it had been presented, few subjects of equal magnitude had ever been submitted to the decision of the National Legislature. That the deep interest felt in the fate of the measure, was not confined to those who were to decide upon it, was apparent from the crowded benches of the Hall and the overflowing gallery. For ourselves, the Throne of Grace had been that morning addressed to purify our hearts and enlighten our understandings for its correct decision. Every one must be struck by the whimsical contrast between the real and factitious importance of the proposition. To judge from the extraordinary exertions of the Speaker, from the ground over which he travelled and the variety of objects noticed by him, it would seem he believed it worthy of the exertions of all his industry, ability, and enthusiasm—that the freedom and happiness of eighteen millions of people were, in truth, involved in its decision. Mr. F. had in vain tasked his imagination to discover that such consequences could follow from it. He could not perceive the miraculous influence of appropriating eighteen thousand dollars for an outfit and salary for a Minister to La Plata, to commence when, in the discretion of the President, a Minister should be sent to that Government. All the facts stated by the Speaker might be admitted, the arguments founded upon them might be considered as conclusive, still the amendment proposed ought not to be adopted. How obvious, then, must be the propriety of rejecting it, when the facts were disputable and the reasoning inconclusive. Admitting the independence of La Plata to be established; that it was the right and the duty of the United States to recognise that independence; that war with Spain or any other Power would not follow; that our interest and our honor required this step to be taken—still the amendment ought to be rejected. If recognition is made, it is to be done in the United States. We are to acknowledge their independence; to send a Minister to La Plata is to ask them to acknowledge ours. A Minister must be sent to, and accredited by this Government. It had not as yet appeared that the Government of La Plata desired or expected us to make such an acknowledgment; at least no one with requisite authority was known to have been sent to this country for the purpose of asking such a favor. Another objection, not less obvious, was presented by the Constitutional division of the powers of the Government. Heretofore the President and Senate were left to the exclusive management of the foreign intercourse of the United States. Ministers were received from other Powers, and sent from this country to other Governments, with whom political or commercial interest required us to negotiate, and the House of Representatives contented itself with its Constitutional check upon the exercise of this authority; satisfied that they could at all times prevent its improvident exertion by withholding appropriations from those missions, the public interest did not require. This, however, proposes a new system; this House, instead of checking, is made to stimulate the Executive to a further extension of its patronage. This new system might have its convenience, but these would be found on examination to be personal conveniences to aspiring and designing members of the Legislative body, at the expense of the general welfare. The suggestion that, under the present extraordinary circumstances of the world, the expression of the public opinion by the Representatives of the people ought to precede the movements of the Executive, was not entitled to the weight which was given to it. The President does not require to be told that the Representatives of the people who selected him to preside over their Government, are prepared at all times, and at every hazard, to do their duty. He dare not doubt that he will be supported in every measure the interest and honor of the nation require him to adopt. Were it really true that the Executive Magistrate had discovered a criminal indifference on this subject, Mr. F. said he would be among the most eager to express such an opinion in the only form in which an opinion could be expressed, by a resolution of the House—boldly and openly declaring its dislike of the course which had been pursued, and recommending the necessary change. The amendment to an appropriation bill in the form proposed did not convey such an opinion. The President might conjecture that such was the intention of the Legislature; yet, even while forming this conjecture, it would be necessary for him to look beyond the act to the motives assigned to those who advocated it. As a measure of ordinary policy the proposition was inadmissible; as an extraordinary measure it was indefensible. It was recommended as a bold, independent, manly expression of the public sentiment, placing the House of Representatives in the front rank in the march of the Government on a dangerous and untried field; it was, in reality, unmeaning and insignificant in its character; and while it proceeds by hinting to the President the course he should pursue, it warily shelters the House from all responsibility for the consequences behind the Executive discretion. If our interference is necessary, let us act effectually; marking the steps necessary to be taken, and taking the responsibility for the result—claiming all the honor, and bearing all the disaster. Let us not at least pretend to give the Executive a discretion already possessed, thus diminishing his responsibility without adding to our own.

Mr. F. could not but remark an apparent contradiction in the address of the Speaker on this subject of the declaration, made a few days since in a discussion of the bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations. He had censured with much asperity the patience discovered by the Government in its correspondence with the Spanish Minister, and thanked his God that he did not possess that Job-like attribute. In the address of yesterday we were told that he was opposed to war with Spain—would do no act which would give her just cause of war—would not violently seize any of her possessions. It would seem that, impatient as the honorable Speaker may be at the situation of the dispute with Spain, he is not disposed to do any act calculated to bring it to an immediate determination. The difference between the Administration and himself, is, that they would wait with patience, and he impatiently, the change in the Spanish councils. The honorable gentleman would pardon the notice of a species of inconsistency in the course he wished to pursue. He believed that Spain ought to be pressed; that the moment was peculiarly fortunate, and ought not to be lost. How was this pressing to be made? By argument? That had been tried in vain. Certainly not. By threats never intended to be executed? The character of the Speaker forbids such a supposition. Not by war; that had been disclaimed.

Not by any means that would give Spain justifiable cause of war. These also had been rejected. It was difficult to imagine how the object was to be accomplished, unless a subsequent suggestion furnished a key to the mystery. He would take the step in relation to the Spanish colonies, we might rightfully take, and leave Spain to do as she thought proper. If she continued to refuse to do us justice, the important question of peace or war was then to be decided. If Mr. F. understood the policy recommended, it was to do rightfully all we could to tempt Spain to declare war against us; and if we failed in all these, then we would declare war against Spain. Thus, while disclaiming all idea of war, the Speaker looked constantly to that issue. The sources of temptation were in the dispute with her colonies; we were first to recognise them, what follows is easily foreseen. The motive for this abandonment of our own quarrel, to engage in war on account of the Spanish American governments, was the apprehension; if we moved in our own case, we should be justly charged with a thirst of aggrandizement—excite the jealousy, perhaps the hostility, of some other Power, and enjoy the sympathy of none. If an interference with Spanish affairs is the ground of dispute, we shall have the sympathies of the world on our side, and excite neither jealousy nor hostility in any of the nations of Europe. Mr. F. believed, with the Speaker, that the present was an auspicious moment for a settlement of the Spanish controversy; that it ought not to be suffered to escape. He was not for war, but for such a movement, in our own dispute, as would place the means of indemnity in our possession, as should enable the Government to do justice to its injured citizens, whatever might be the future condition of the Spanish monarchy. It was war if Spain choose to consider it so; it was short of war if she desired to remain at peace. The jealousy or hostility of foreign Powers could not be reasonably excited by such a course. Sympathy was out of the question. No European Government felt it for the United States: they do not fear our power, but they dread our example; they do not apprehend danger from our physical strength, but tremble at the moral influence of our institutions. The course of the Speaker was the one best calculated to excite all their jealousies and hostilities; to confirm an idea, Spain had been at all times exerting herself to enforce, that we were the cause of the disturbances in her possessions, the aiders and abettors of her revolting subjects, and on all occasions ready to sow discord among the subjects of Princes, and to jeopardize the safety of the colonial dependencies of European Powers. War with Spain was no bugbear to him; but, if it was commenced, it should be in our own quarrel, and should not be mixed with baser matter. The Administration occupied the middle ground between the Speaker and himself, probably the safest and most congenial to the wishes and the interests of the people. There was one point on which there would be no dispute between them; the policy of the Government was by each of them preferred to the policy recommended by the other. Mr. F. was, however, justified, by the opinion of the Speaker, in believing that a war would not be the consequence of either project. "Spain would not, and could not, declare war against us, from the state of her finances, and the ruin of her resources." The wisdom of the two plans was, therefore, to be tested by the benefits which we would or should derive from complete success, without the hazard of a contest for either.

The amendment was advocated as a recognition of the independence of La Plata. The argument of the honorable mover was directed to this point; and Mr. F. was well aware that one question was frequently argued, and another decided, and that the vote on the decision was sometimes determined on the merits of the question discussed. Considering it as an open proposition to recognise, he was content to meet it, and that it should succeed or fail on the propriety of refusing or making an immediate recognition. Where was the motive for this step? What beneficial consequences will flow from it to La Plata or the United States? What benefits, commercial or political, will accrue? The commerce between the people of this Government and that of the revolutionary La Plata, was free and unrestrained. Our citizens enjoyed all that they asked in the ports of Buenos Ayres, and the people of La Plata were admitted to all the rights and hospitalities that are shown to any foreigners in the waters of the United States. Arms, ammunition, all the product of our agriculture and industry, that their wants may require, are freely purchased and transported in their own or American vessels, without delay or molestation. Their vessels, armed and equipped for war, are admitted without scruple into our ports and treated with a kindness they have but too frequently abused. Are there any important political results to proceed from this step to either party? To us there certainly are none; to them the only possible advantage would be the probability that our example would be followed by the rest of the world. Mr. F. spoke on the supposition that no war with Spain was produced by this act. Our recognition was better calculated to excite the jealousy and prejudice of despotic Governments against this new Power, than to produce a similar recognition of their claims to a place in the family of nations; better calculated to produce a combination of despotic power, to their ruin, than a friendly aid in the accomplishment of their independence. This acknowledgment was useless to them politically and commercially. All the practical benefits arising from it, were enjoyed so long as we considered their independence as existing without pronouncing a decision upon that point disputed by them with Spain. Where was the motive to be found to justify this improvident hurry to the useless acknowledgment of a Government whose independence depended wholly upon its own exertions? That could not be aided in its progress by such a declaration, unless accompanied by substantial aid; an aid even the sanguine gentleman from Kentucky did not propose to give. It was said, however, that we ought to be the first to acknowledge a sister Republic. If we did not who would? With more than ordinary diligence, Mr. F. had endeavored to find the freedom and liberality in the frame and institutions of this new Government, which would entitle it to this name. He had sought for them in vain. There was a Congress and a Supreme Director; a Congress, the Speaker has said, chosen somewhat like our own. Mr. F. would have rejoiced to learn in what this resemblance consisted. If the Congress were chosen by the people, he had been deceived by the Outline of the Revolution in Spanish America; a work to which he referred on the recommendation of the Speaker. The sole resemblance was in name. The Government of La Plata was a military despotism, like the Republic of France in the days of the Consulate, but destitute of its order, strength, and stability. If the resemblance was perfect, and the Government and people of La Plata worthy to be ranked by our side in the community of nations, still the inutility of such an acknowledgment is a satisfactory reason for refraining from it.

Mr. FORSYTH thought he might safely leave the question to the judgment of the Committee, after showing that the most powerful recommendations of the amendment were, that it was unmeaning and harmless. But he considered it a duty to examine more at large the various inducements offered by the Speaker to insure its success. Mr. F. knew and felt the danger to which he exposed himself by this course—that he would be assailed as an enemy to liberty, &c. Exertions had been made to prepare the public mind for such impressions against all those who thought with him on this subject. Notice had been given from this city, and was now ringing through the Western country, that questions were to be brought into view, by whose decision the people would be able to discriminate between those who were just and unjust to the patriot cause—between the friends and the enemies of freedom. Such considerations had no influence upon his conduct. He who was deterred by anticipated censure, or threatened calumny, from the performance of any duty, was not worthy to represent a free people—to preside even in the most subordinate sphere over the movements of a mighty empire. Careless of the motives which might be imputed to him, he should proceed to show that the Speaker had offered no sufficient inducement to justify his proposal in the origin, progress, or character, of the revolution in Spanish America; that it is not demanded by our commercial or political interest in the great struggle between Spain and her former dependencies; that while he admitted it was the right of the United States, it was not a duty to recognise the new Government; that it could not be done without the danger of war with Spain; and that it was not sufficiently demonstrated that Buenos Ayres had established, and would maintain, a free and independent Government. In tracing the origin of the revolution, the Speaker had carried us back to the first invasion of Mexico and Peru, to the days of Cortez and Pizarro, of Montezuma and Atahualpa. From that period he had given a faint outline of the cruel, selfish, monopolizing, and debasing policy of Spain to her American dependencies—foreign and inter-colonial intercourse forbidden to her subjects in those magnificent and fertile regions of the earth; the pursuits of agriculture directed by the narrow policy of an unjust Government; the soul itself debased to the purposes of oppression by municipal regulation. It was a gloomy picture of a sad reality; a faithful representation of nature, drawn by a master's hand. The policy was but too truly characterized, and its success was as complete as its character was atrocious. It had been pursued with undeviating steadiness, until the horrible contrast was exhibited of a people the most debased, in the midst of the fairest regions of the globe; man, the master-work of creation, with intellect enervated by despotism, and soul withered by superstition, surrounded by the most sublime and stupendous monuments of inanimated nature. Was the origin of the revolution to be found in this systematic oppression? It would be looked for here in vain. To use the language of the Speaker, Spain would have succeeded in continuing this system but for the transactions of Bayonne. The puerile ambition of Napoleon was the foundation of the South American struggle. The Old World was convulsed; eighteen millions of people were agitated in the new, by his childish desire to have a King of the new dynasty on the throne of Spain; by his silly anxiety to substitute the Bonapartes for the Bourbons, over all nations dependent upon his colossal power. Was this great event hailed with joy by the Spanish Americans? Was the glorious opportunity of breaking their chains seized with avidity? Far, very far, from it. They were stunned by this unexpected occurrence; stupified by the dreadful alternative of self-government, or submission to French rule. Like the unhappy man long immured in the gloom of a prison, they had been so long deprived of his glorious light, that the beams of the blessed sun were hateful to their eyes. This fortunate event was considered a national calamity, to which there was no alleviation but the opportunity it afforded to discover their unshaken loyalty and blind devotion to the cause of their adored King. Their resources were devoted to his service. The sole difficulty was to find, during his imprisonment, a substitute for the royal authority. The laws, and customs, and frame of Government, in other respects, remained without change; the municipalities, haciendas, audiencias, &c., all the subordinate machinery, continued in its accustomed place, and performed its accustomed operations; and, although the necessity of additional exertion produced a greater vigor of character and boldness of thought in the heads of the Government, the great mass remained unaltered in habits, opinions, and desires. England, covering the peninsula of Spain and Portugal with her armies, and, the enemy of France, procuring, without difficulty, the great object of her long continued solicitude—a free commerce with Spanish America. Juntas were established upon the same principles as the Juntas of Spain, and war with the Junta of Spain was occasioned by the refusal of Spanish America to acknowledge that they were the legitimate repository of the royal power in both hemispheres. The unhappy land was rent by internal factions, in which the people were the instruments of designing ambition. The leading men disputed for the honor of being the royal substitute, none for the glory of establishing a free Government, founded upon the principles of justice and equality, whose basis was the power, whose object was the happiness of the people. The most bold, and successful, and honorable exertion, for the formation of a liberal Government, was made in Venezuela. But this new Government was overturned by an earthquake in 1812. The misguided people were induced to believe that this awful visitation was the immediate consequence of their conduct, the just judgment of an angry God upon the revolution, and those who promoted or favored its success.*

* "After many months of continued debates, the Representatives of Venezuela offered, for the approbation of the people, on the 23d of December, 1811, the promised constitution. It formed a volume, divided into nine chapters. In the first, the Roman Catholic religion is proposed as that of the State. In the second, it is proposed that the General Congress should be divided into two Houses—that of the Representatives and the Senate; to be jointly invested with the power of declaring war, making peace, raising armies, &c.; the election of the Representatives to be made by electoral colleges, and that of the Senate by the provincial legislatures. The third chapter treats of the Executive power, which was to be confided to three persons, to be chosen by the electoral colleges; and these persons were to be invested with power to nominate generals for the army, and to appoint officers to whom the administration and collection of the public revenue were to be intrusted, &c. The fourth chapter describes a supreme court of justice, which was to decide on civil and criminal questions in matters concerning the Federal compact; likewise the trial by jury, &c. The fifth determines the limits of the provincial authorities, the mutual guarantee of the provinces to each other, and that Guayana and Maracaibo should be admitted into the Federation as soon as they were free from Spain. The sixth and seventh propose that the constitution should be revised, and receive the sanction of the people. The eighth declares the sovereignty of the people—the rights of man in society—that foreigners of any nation whatever should be admitted into Venezuela, provided they would respect the national religion; that the use of torture should be abolished, &c. The ninth and last is devoted to general subjects; treats of promoting the civilization of the Indians, and declaring the mulattoes and pardos eligible to any employment whatever in the State; likewise of confirming the abolition of the slave trade, as decreed by the supreme junta of Caracas on the 14th July, 1810.

"In imitation of the United States of America, the Congress set apart a territory, in which the authorities of the confederation were to reside; the town of Va-

It might be imagined that the principles of political, civil, and religious freedom had been developed in the progress of the revolution; the present state of it would discover how far the people of Spanish America had improved in the knowledge of their personal rights, and their determination to maintain them. In Mexico the contest was at an end; at all times of a doubtful issue, the last ray of hope was extinguished by the death of the gallant and unfortunate Mina. This disastrous termination of the struggle was not produced by the successful exertion of the power of Old Spain; it was effected by the efforts of a people who formed a large portion of the eighteen millions of men who were represented as contending in the glorious cause of freedom. In Caracas, a sanguinary, and dreadful, and, at best, a doubtful contest was maintained with the modern Alva, by the imitator of his cruelty, Bolivar. La Plata and Chili had better prospects of success; and all our sanguine hopes are fixed upon them. Thus, of the eighteen millions of people, for whom our sympathy is demanded, more than thirteen millions are the contented slaves of the Spanish authority; and it was the madness or stupidity of Ferdinand, that prevented the voluntary return of all to their ancient thralldom. A decree of oblivion for the past would have reinstated the Spanish power, if it had been promulgated by Ferdinand on his restoration to the throne. Mr. F. rested this opinion lencia was fixed upon, and the Congress there held its session in the beginning of March, 1812.

"All prospered in Venezuela at that time; the Government was respected; the military force sufficient to support it, and the public mind was unanimous. Commerce was in some degree flourishing, and Venezuela, wishing to promote that with England, a reduction of four per cent. was made in the custom-house duties in favor of English manufactures. Three thousand men, under the command of General Moreno, were on the banks of the Orinoco, ready to cross that river, and attack the royalists in the city of Guayana or Angostura, whose inhabitants had, on many occasions, evinced their inclination in favor of the new Government, but were checked by the Spaniards from publicly declaring this inclination. Colonel Xalon, with one battalion of good troops, was stationed at Barquisimeto, supposing the royalists of Coro might attempt an attack on that side. But, alas! short in Venezuela was the possession of this prosperity!

"On the 26th of March, 1812, between four and five P. M., Venezuela was visited by one of those tremendous earthquakes which from time to time ruin whole provinces. During a minute and fifteen seconds the earth was convulsed in every direction, and nearly twenty thousand persons fell victims. The towns of Caracas, Lagunayra, Mayquetia, Merida, and San Felipe, were totally destroyed. Barquisimeto, Valencia, La Vittoria, and others, suffered considerably. This catastrophe happened on Holy Thursday, a day when every Christian church peculiarly commemorates the sufferings of our blessed Redeemer, and at the very hour when the people were crowding into the churches to attend the processions which are usual in Roman Catholic countries, and to see the representation of our Saviour led to the cross. Troops are placed on such upon the authority of a work to which he had before referred, the Outline of the Revolution in South America. In the conclusion of that work it is said "the return of Ferdinand might have brought with it the return of peace. The people were tired of war; the leaders of the revolution disappointed in their views; a large body of the people in a state of apathy or indifference; and, what was still more important, the veneration attached to the name of Ferdinand still existed, though, in some degree, diminished." This veneration was converted into a dread of his resentment, by the mission of Morillo and his sanguinary suite. Mr. F. trusted in Heaven that this act of royal madness would meet with its appropriate punishment, in the total subversion of his western empire; that thus compelled to continue a resistance to the Spanish yoke, that the people would acquire what experience and suffering had not yet taught them, the knowledge of their strength, and the means of using it to the establishment of a Government similar to ours. Such were his ardent wishes, not his confident expectations. That the independence of all, or portions of the southern continent would, at no distant day, be achieved, could not be doubted; to what extent civil liberty would be established, was matter of speculation. Opinions, more or less favorable, would be formed, according to the sanguine or cautious temper of the judge. In the origin and progress of the revolution, there occasions at the entrance of the churches, to follow the procession; and many churches, and the principal barracks at Caracas, being thrown down, there was a considerable number of soldiers killed, and many thousand persons crushed under their ruins. The arms and ammunition destined for the defence of the country were buried in a similar manner; and what was worse, an unconquerable enemy to the independence of Venezuela seemed to raise its head from among the ruins—that religious prejudice which the earthquake inspired.

"In an era less remarkable, a mere convulsion of nature would have had no influence on a new Government; but, notwithstanding the prosperity Venezuela then enjoyed, the seeds of discontent had fallen on one class of the community. The principles which formed the basis of the new constitution were democratical, and it had been necessary to deprive the clergy of some of their privileges, which of course created enmity in their minds to the present Government. Immediately after the earthquake the priests proclaimed that the Almighty condemned the revolution, and they denounced his wrath on all who favored it. They construed into a manifestation of the Divine displeasure the occurrence of the earthquake on Holy Thursday, because the revolution had commenced on that festival; although it was not the anniversary, for this feast is moveable, and is celebrated on a different day every year. They made the people fancy that hell was opening to swallow them.

"Such was the effect at this time of religious enthusiasm! Unprejudiced persons were undoubtedly not of the number; but these were few, compared with the host they had to resist; which, availing itself of the general consternation, biassed the public opinion in favor of the Spanish Government."

was no inducement to an act of doubtful policy. But our sympathy was demanded for this great cause, in character so like that of our Revolution. Sympathy for the people of the South was universally felt, and might be indulged, without scruple, in wishes and in hopes; but, when it was made the foundation of an attempt to precipitate the adoption of a favorite measure, it was necessary to examine how far it was justly inspired. That the cause of the colonies was just, and that they were entitled to the good wishes of all mankind in their contest with Spain, was unquestionable; but we are expected to feel and indulge a deeper sympathy, arising from the alleged similarity of their situation and that of the United States in 1776, from a congeniality of feeling, opinions, and pursuits, between the Spanish Americans and our predecessors. The honorable member from Kentucky had solemnly invoked the departed spirits of our ancestors to give him strength and ability to vindicate a people contending in a cause as glorious as that in which they had been engaged. An invocation to those illustrious shades to pardon a profanation of their ashes, by this odious comparison, would have better become him; and if the inhabitants of the other world are permitted to interest themselves in the transactions of this life, they would, no doubt, find, in the purity of his intentions, the motive for this forgiveness. Was not the comparison odious? In what consisted this boasted resemblance? They are colonies, contending to be independent of the parent country—so were we; here the resemblance ceases. In the motives of the contests, in the causes which produced them, in their means, and in their ends, there is contrast, not resemblance. We asserted, vindicated, maintained, and improved our rights, political, civil, and religious. We saw oppression as it approached us; remonstrated with firmness against injustice; discussed with calmness the extent of our obligations and the nature of our rights. With a perfect knowledge of the doubtful issue of a contest with our powerful, proud, and ambitious stepmother, we encountered its perils and pursued it with virtuous steadiness, until our triumph was as signal as our moderation had been conspicuous. They were oppressed and contented, manacled and reconciled to their chains, until accident compelled them to involuntary exertions. Political independence was cast upon them, and is now the sole object of continued resistance. If human rights are secured by success, it is an unlooked for, unexpected consequence; an unknown good, a result not desired by those who were to derive its benefits. Political independence was, with us, the means for the accomplishment of our object. With us it was emphatically a war of the people. The Government organized to conduct it was established by them. In the numerous changes of the persons in power, it was the immediate and regular expression of their will, that elevated or depressed the candidates for their confidence. The Confederation, a rope of sand, had tenacity and strength enough to bind them together, while union was necessary to success. During the contest, the military was completely subordinate to the civil power. With them, the first and the last movements in the contest were made without consulting the will of the people, and no means have yet been afforded by which it can be effectually expressed. They have neither agency in the management of, nor control over, the acts of the Government, created for them. Revolution has succeeded revolution. Every change of rulers has been produced by a change in the form of substitution for the royal authority. The civil has been at all times subordinate to the military power. There was an equally striking dissimilarity in the manner in which the wars were conducted. With us, with the exception of some personal, intestine, and bloody feuds between Whig and Tory, it was carried on with the strictest regard to the laws of honorable and civilized warfare; no instance occurred of the death of the unresisting by the command of any officer in the public service. It must not be forgotten that ample justification was given by the British armies for a contrary system. The massacre of Paoli and the murder of Hayne were still fresh in the recollection of all. But, while burning with resentment for these atrocious deeds, we did not forget what was due to our character, and dishonor our reputation by following a horrible example. The cold-blooded massacre nerved the arms and steeled the hearts of our soldiers in the hour of conflict, but the cry of mercy never was raised in vain by a vanquished foe. When the gallant Hayne was barbarously executed by a British officer, whose present rank and subsequent achievements could not remove the stain of this sanguinary act from his character, the deep indignation of the nation was excited. A gallant officer was selected to pay with his life for the cruelty of his country. But the sacrifice was never made, and the gallant and generous officer was reserved to perish in defending the reputation of that people, by whose forbearance his life, forfeited by the injustice of his country, was spared. Mr. F. would not be understood to call in question the justice of the retaliatory system of extermination adopted by the Spanish Americans. He believed that the dreadful example was set by the Royalists, and the resort to it was justifiable, and perhaps essential to security and success. All he proposed by this examination was to show, what was highly honorable to his own countrymen, that a resort to such a system was not made by them under the strongest temptations, and under circumstances which would have fully justified it. The comparison was made to show the exalted character of our own contest, not excite prejudice against that of neighboring nations.

If the sanguine temper of the Speaker had deluded him into a belief so derogatory to the character of his own country, it was not surprising that he should have erred in estimating the commercial and political interest of the United States in the South American struggle. That we have a deep interest in the fate of Spanish America could not be denied; but it was a moral interest—the interest which man felt for the condition of man in all quarters of the world. Whatever may be the changes that may take place from the Rio Bravo to Cape Horn, no essentially favorable alteration can be produced in the extent of our commerce, in the purity or stability of our political institutions. Spanish America would afford to us but a trifling portion of her eighty-one millions of exports. With the exception of her mineral productions, her exports were of the same kind with the exports of this country: the great staples were cotton, tobacco, rice, breadstuffs, hemp, &c.; her imports, European manufactures. Mr. F. would not use as an argument the agricultural rivalry that might ensue, under a different state of things, to induce a wish that the present condition of Spanish America might continue; but he would use it to demonstrate the fallacy of the opinion that our commercial prosperity would be greatly increased by the expected change in her political condition. On this point he would ask the attention of the Committee to a few sentences from a work just published, whose author relied upon the statements of Humboldt, a man whose opportunities to procure, and ability to select, the most valuable and accurate information, was universally known. After giving a most appalling account of the present state of the imports to Mexico from the United States, as compared with those of Great Britain, he says:

"But if the imports, according to the report, are by no means promising, as it respects the demand for our productions, some items of the exports are also of a nature to excite serious reflections in the minds of those who are concerned in agricultural pursuits. Among the exports to the other colonies, we find the article of 26,371 bales or sacks of flour, and 3,207 arrobas, of 25 lbs. each, of cotton. Speaking of the Mexican flour, Humboldt says, 'it enters into competition at the Havana market with that of the United States. When the road which is constructing from the table land of Perote to Vera Cruz shall be completely finished, the grain of New Spain will be exported for Bordeaux, Hamburg, and Bremen. The Mexicans will then possess a double advantage over the inhabitants of the United States, that of a greater fertility of the territory, and that of a lower price of labor.' And on the article of tobacco he observes, that 'the cultivation of Mexican tobacco might become a branch of agriculture of the very highest importance, if the trade in it were free. At Vera Cruz the quantity of tobacco produced in the district of Dixaba and Cordova, is computed at 1,600,000 pounds to 2,000,000 pounds.' The indefinite increase of the growth of tobacco is prevented by the royal monopoly, which not only prescribes the quantity, but the very districts in which only it can be cultivated. He also observes, on the subject of the cotton of Mexico, that 'New Spain supplies Europe annually with 625,000 pounds of cotton.' This quantity, though in itself very inconsiderable, is, however, six times greater than that exported by the United States, of their own growth, in 1791: and in twelve years the produce of cotton has become in the United States three hundred and seventy-seven times greater. When we consider the physical positions of the United States and Mexico, we can hardly entertain a doubt that these two countries will one day be enabled to produce all the cotton employed in the manufactures of Europe. The great staples of the United States are grain, flour, tobacco, rice, cotton, and the products of the fisheries, and lumber. The bulky character of these articles requires, and actually employs, so much shipping for this transportation, that in point of mercantile tonnage, we are already superior to any nation in Europe, Great Britain excepted. Considering, therefore, the importance of these staples in their tendency to our internal welfare, and their influence on our maritime strength, we cannot contemplate, without feelings of great concern, any contingency, however remote, which may operate unfavorably to either."

Mr. F. would not fatigue the Committee by following the author in his investigation of this subject, through the whole extent of Spanish America, but would content himself with quoting that portion of the work which related to the provinces of La Plata, the immediate object of their present inquiry:

"The climate and soil of Buenos Ayres are singularly favorable to the growth of wheat and barley; and whenever this country shall have acquired a competent population, the extent of its produce in both will be equal to any demand, however great. During the late war in Spain, considerable quantities were shipped, under contract with the British Government, to the ports of Spain and Portugal. Under these circumstances it is to be expected that, in any event, our commercial intercourse with this country will not be a subject of national importance."

"Our observations respecting Buenos Ayres apply with still more force to Chili; because the latter is still more remote, being situated on the Pacific Ocean, in nearly the same latitude with Buenos Ayres, and corresponding with it in productions."

It must be sufficiently obvious from these extracts, that the hope of commercial gain must be founded upon our ability to be the carriers of Spanish America, in her commerce with the world; or in our ability to compete with other nations in the supply of such manufactured articles as are consumed by her inhabitants. In the direct commerce from Europe to South America, we cannot hope to participate. Every nation wisely regulates this subject, like ourselves. Competition is confined to their own vessels, and those of the nation with whom it has direct intercourse. We must be able to perform circuitous voyages with greater facility and at a smaller expense than direct voyages are performed by other nations. A contest hopeless, unless war rages among all the other maritime Powers of the earth. Even in this extraordinary state of the world, we should have to contend with the naval enterprise of the newly-created empires. This is considered as of but little consequence by the Speaker. He supposes that Spanish America can never become a great maritime Power. And for what reason? A strange one, indeed. They are too near the sun! The climate is too warm and relaxing; the inhabitants cannot contend on the ocean with the hardy and enterprising children of the bleak and bracing regions of a northern sky. All history condemns this strange theory.

Ask your naval heroes if they have not found that the sailors of the Southern are equal in strength, activity, courage, and hardihood to their Northern brethren? If they would not prefer the sailors of Louisiana to the natives of the frozen and barren regions of Labrador? If the improvement of our South American brethren keeps pace with the anticipation of the gentleman from Kentucky, their emancipation will create for us formidable rivals in agriculture, and powerful competitors for maritime superiority; a rivalry and competition Mr. F. would most cheerfully contribute to produce, if it was to be succeeded by the establishment of civil, political, and religious freedom in that unhappy land. We were, however, required to elevate our views to futurity; to consider that we were legislating for posterity; while it was admitted that at present we could not successfully vie in the markets of this new world with the manufacturers of Europe, the time was approaching when we should undersell the European manufacturers. Mr. F. did not believe this time would arrive during the present century; he hoped it never would arrive. He should deeply deplore the arrival of that period at which manufacturing establishments would be more profitable than the pursuits of agriculture. He wished the articles of first necessity to be fabricated here; beyond this his wishes did not extend. As to the present question, it was sufficient for the purposes of his argument to show, that we could not hope to partake largely of the golden profits of Spanish American commerce, without a thorough change in the present pursuits of the inhabitants of the United States. A change neither desirable nor probable.

Splendid political consequences were anticipated from the expected change. The freedom of the commerce of the Mississippi—the safe navigation of the Gulf of Mexico—the power and effect we should derive, from being the head of a confederation of republics. In case of necessity, the new world of republics was to be arrayed against the old world of despotisms. In the event of European wars, we shall have powerful auxiliaries in the assertion of neutral rights. And was it really apprehended we should ever want aid to maintain the free commerce of the Mississippi or the Gulf of Mexico? these might be safely trusted to our gallant tars and the people of the West. Suppose this great change to have taken place. Overleap in imagination the progress of centuries, and see the United States connected with Republican Governments to the Southern extremity of the New World; the first, if you please, in wealth and power; overcoming the disadvantages of situation and climate, by her superior skill and superior industry. What superior advantages will the people enjoy that are not possessed by ourselves? Will they be more free, more happy, more virtuous, and less exposed to the danger of internal commotion and external violence? The power of the Government to destroy other nations would be increased; the power of the Government to promote the welfare of the people, the object for which it exists, would remain the same. Connected with people, active, intelligent, and jealous as ourselves, our rivals in commerce, in agriculture, in science, and in the freedom of their institutions; will these elements of strife be composed to harmony by the tender names of sister Republics? Men do not change their nature with their Governments? Brooding avarice, malignant revenge, daring ambition—will find their place under all forms of government, in all ages and in every clime. Mr. F. would not look further into the consequences which might be anticipated from the working of these passions among the affiliated nations. As in the days of ancient Greece, the ground of quarrel would be, who should be the first; and some Eastern Satrap might again be found, to foment the quarrels and distract the councils of the Western World. There was one remedy for these dangers; instead of many, but two Republics should be created of the North and South Americas. Mr. F. was not yet prepared to risk the happiness and the security of the people of the United States, by such a sublime but hazardous extension of their political system. Nations, like individuals, were, under God, the fabricators of their own fortunes. Of this nation this was undeniably true. We want no power which we cannot acquire, since we desire none but for our own protection. We ask no aid, since we will not invade the rights of others; to defend ours, our own strength is amply sufficient. We are free, independent, and happy, so long as the people are true to themselves. United, combined Europe would be arrayed against them in vain. No man need look beyond our own borders for the means of securing and perpetuating all that is valuable in life and liberty. In the assertion of neutral rights it was but too fashionable to look beyond our own resources; the experience of the late war satisfactorily demonstrated that it was unnecessary. It discovered to us, that aid was not to be found where it was expected; it demonstrated that it was not required. He rejoiced that that contest was commenced and terminated without an ally, and he most heartily thanked the English Government for refusing the proffered mediation of the Emperor of all the Russias. The obligation of that offer would weigh upon his spirit, had not the load been removed by the nonchalance with which the refusal of the other Power had been received, and the equivocal treatment experienced by our Ministers from the Court of St. Petersburg. We want no aid and no ally for asserting any of our rights. The experience of the late contest was not less useful to ourselves than to others; it taught them, too, the secret of our power;—trust to its effect; the impression was deep, and the remembrance will be lasting. Mr. F. would not press this inquiry, lest he should be suspected of desiring to produce a wish that Spanish America should remain dependent. All he desired was, by bringing other objects into view, to save the Committee from the seducing enthusiasm of the Speaker. If the question of Spanish American independence depended upon our selfish considerations of interest, it never would be achieved. If we were governed by the ordinary policy of nations, we should desire the re-establishment of the Spanish power, since it impeded the progress of our neighbors, and left us undisputed masters of the world of western enterprise. But our policy was as liberal as our institutions. We looked anxiously for the emancipation and improvement of the Spanish Americans, however formidable their competition and dangerous their rivalry. We desired it for their good, and not for our advantage. That the United States had a right to acknowledge any Government, was a political axiom. That it was our duty to recognise the Government of La Plata, remains to be proved. If our interest and our honor require it; if it is demanded by our obligations to that Government, it was a duty. What interest have we in this independence, which should induce us, first among the nations of the earth, to welcome this stranger? Was it commercial? The fact that we had not more than twenty vessels in the commerce of La Plata, and that number diminishing, while the English had more than two hundred, was a proof of the extent of our commercial interest in this region of the world. Separated at a distance so remote, where was the political consideration to demand it from us? There was none. We are asked to do what France did for us. Mr. P. said, the United States had already done more, openly, for La Plata than France ever did for the United States, prior to her determination to go to war with England. The United States were now in advance of all the nations of the earth, except the Government of Brazil, in kindness to Buenos Ayres. France, prior to the capture of Burgoyne, forbade her subjects to supply us with arms and munitions of war; would not suffer our vessels of war to enter her ports, but, according to the provisions of the Treaty of Utrecht, when driven in by stress of weather, and their stay was limited to the duration of the danger. We openly permit the exportation of every necessary for the use of the people of La Plata. Their vessels enjoy every privilege enjoyed by Spanish vessels, or the armed vessels of any other nation, in our harbors. We wish them success: they know it well; we do not conceal, or affect to conceal, it from Spain. These privileges are denied them by all the Powers of Europe, or if granted, are yielded to them in secret by England.

We have proclaimed a strict neutrality; regulated our conduct by the rule of the national law. "In civil wars foreigners are not to interfere in the internal government of an independent State. It belongs not to them to judge between the citizens whom discord has roused to arms, nor between a Prince and his subjects. Both parties are equally foreigners to them, and equally independent of their authority." The circumstance to which the Speaker referred, if correctly stated, is the most certain evidence that our conduct has been consistent with our professions. We have pleased neither party, while more fortunate England has succeeded in pleasing both parties. Honorable neutrality is never grateful or pleasing to either of the belligerents: pretended neutrality and secret assistance is grateful to that Power to whom aid is given. England may have been artful enough to persuade Spain that her four hundred thousand pounds was intended for this purpose, while her secret supplies of arms have satisfied the United Provinces that England desired only to promote their success. Our duty cannot require us to do what is useless—what is calculated to confirm a charge made against us, of fomenting the disturbances in Spanish America; a charge to which probable evidence is already afforded by the expeditions of Miranda, of Carrera, of Mina; all of whom sailed from these States to their places of respective destination. It is the duty and the interest of England to stand forth as the protector or first friend of the new Government. She enjoys the fruits of their separation from the parent country; she fomented the quarrel. Then let her take the risk, as she will take the honor and the profits of the recognition of the new Power. Mr. F. was at a loss to conjecture why it had not already been done by England, unless she feared the undefined and undefinable obligations of the Holy League, or was content to reap the present profits, reserving to herself the power to secure the future, either by recognising the new people on favorable conditions, or by restoring them by her mediation to their former master, on conditions equally favorable to her commercial interest.

At what risk, it may be asked, will this recognition be made? At the hazard of a war with Spain. The gentleman from Kentucky says it is not justifiable cause of war. Does he mean in the eye of reason, or in the opinion of nations? In the opinion of nations it certainly is justifiable cause of war; and it is not to be doubted, that, were situations reversed, such a recognition of the independence of one of these States of the Union—Louisiana, for example—by Spain, would be instantly followed by war. The Speaker seemed, indeed, to doubt the soundness of this position, as he pressed principally the want of ability in Spain to make war, not the deficiency of just motive for declaring it. That war would follow with England, should Spain venture upon a contest with us, Mr. F. did not believe. She would have the most powerful motives for neutrality. The glorious opportunity of ruining our commerce would be afforded, and would be seized with avidity. The increased expense of shipments in American vessels would throw the whole of our trade into British bottoms, and our flag would be driven from the ocean, except where it floated over our public or private armed ships. Mr. F. would encounter this danger of a war with Spain, with all its consequences, for an adequate motive; but he would not, by hurrying to do an act useless at best, and which might hereafter be performed without hazarding anything. At all events, he was unwilling to encounter it, until La Plata had shown, by indisputable testimony, that she was independent, and had the power and the will to maintain it.

Was there a free Government in La Plata, for whose existence we ought to encounter any hazard? Was there a Government independent of Spain, and which could not be compelled by the power, or seduced by the cajolements of Spain, to its former vassalage? The character of the Government might be read in the history of its formation; in the changes which preceded it; and in acts since it was established. The disturbances in the Peninsula induced the Viceroy of Buenos Ayres (Cissneros) to call a Junta in May, 1810, composed of the officers of the Royal Government. In April, 1811, a new Government was formed, by the inhabitants of the city of Buenos Ayres, having been called together for that purpose by the municipality of the city. This Government—which, like the other, was but a name for a new organization of the Regal power—was composed of three members and two secretaries. According to the El Estatuto, one member, exercising the Executive power, was to vacate his seat at the expiration of six months, and his place was to be supplied by election. The deputies of the municipalities of the provinces were to form the electoral college. The first assembly for the election of one of the members of the Executive authority met on the 5th day of April, 1812, and nominated Puerrydon for one member of the Government. They proposed to form a constitution, but were dissolved by the existing authority—Puerrydon deriving no power from this nomination. The second assembly met on the 6th of October, 1813, and elected Medrano; but, pursuing the track of their predecessors, they met a similar fate. The municipality, people of the city, and troops, opposed their measures, and the assembly was dissolved by military force.

A meeting of the inhabitants of Buenos Ayres, Cabildo Abierto, was convened on the 8th day of October, 1812, and the administration was vested in Pena, Passo, and Johnste. Thus perished the first constitution, after existing twelve months, and being violated in all its provisions. In January, 1813, a new assembly met; the Constituyente, composed of deputies, nominated by the electoral colleges of the towns and cities of Rio de La Plata; the chief acts of the new assembly was the change of the title of the Government from Gobierno Superior, to Supremo Poder Ejecutivo, and the decree of Freedom to the Children of Slaves. The same decree compelled a sale of every third male slave to be enrolled in the army, the price being a debt due to the owners by the State. In December, 1813, the government of those persons was annulled by the assembly, and Pozados was chosen Supreme Director, to give strength by concentrating the Executive powers. In January, 1815, Pozados having resigned, Alviar was appointed Supreme Director. In April, 1815, there was a new revolution. A meeting of the inhabitants of Buenos Ayres was convened, and the authority of Alviar and the Assembly disowned. The municipality was vested with the supreme command. The municipality formed a junta called De Observacion, by whom a new constitution was published. Rondeau was named Director, but, being in military command with the army, Colonel Alvarez, a ringleader in the revolt, was made his substitute. Alvarez convoked a Congress, but before it assembled he was dispossessed by another commotion of the power he held in the absence of Rondeau. Belcora was then appointed Supreme Director, but was soon after removed, and the administration placed in the hands of a committee. The Congress of Tucuman met in 1816, chose Puerrydon Supreme Director, and declared the independence of the Provinces of La Plata on the 3d of July; proposed to publish a manifesto, which was published in 1817, and to form a constitution that has not yet been matured. In this hasty sketch of the events which led to the establishment of the Government as it now existed, it must have occurred to the members of the Committee that there was no agency of the people in its organization, except the commotions in the city of Buenos Ayres; they seem to have been the idle spectators of the movements of the constituted authorities and the military. For aught that appeared, the ancient institutions below the head of the Government, remained as formerly. Mr. F. would not detail the accusations, trials, executions, and banishments, which were the consequences of these changes. That the people were not deeply interested in the successive changes, and did not appear to have derived essential benefits from them, was sufficiently obvious, and all he desired to establish. The conduct of Puerrydon to Carrera, since this declaration of independence, may serve further to illustrate the character of this new power. Carrera was a Chilean, the author of the revolution there; in the decline of his fortune, he came to the United States, and after procuring resources for renewed efforts, returned to La Plata to execute his designs; he carried with him the hopes and good wishes of all the friends of freedom in the United States. Unfortunately, he expected assistance from La Plata, and sailed with confidence into her ports. An expedition having been prepared in La Plata, against Chili, instead of receiving aid from Carrera, in the deliverance of his country from slavery and oppression, the ostensible motive for this expedition, he was seized, imprisoned, and finally banished; the only satisfaction he received is to be found in that part of Puerrydon's exposé that has been read by the Speaker, in which he deprecates the rudeness which he has been compelled to show, so contrary to the politeness and urbanity of his own nature, and that of his Government. The motives for this course may be collected from the recent accounts from Chili. A letter of the 7th of October says, "More than eighty persons of the first distinction have been seized and thrown into dungeons by the military, on the ground of attachment to General Carrera, and the treasures of Chili were exhausted by contributions to Buenos Ayres, and the people of Chili are experiencing the benefits of that kind of deliverance from the Royal Spaniards, by O'Higgins and the army of Buenos Ayres, that France has experienced under the Bourbons, supported by the armies of Wellington and Alexander." The power of Spain had not been exerted against this new Government—not a Spanish soldier or bayonet had been sent from Old Spain since the restoration of Ferdinand. Was the new Government possessed of the physical and moral strength to resist her efforts when they should be made? Gentlemen should not deceive themselves. Spain, inert and powerless as she was, was a formidable power to Spanish America, by the nature of the Government, and the superstition of its inhabitants. She had ample resources for the purchase of assistance, should she be driven to this resort. The time had not arrived when the Spanish Monarch asked himself the important question—What part of my dominions will I surrender for the preservation of the rest? When he is willing to make great sacrifices he can procure ample assistance. Those who sold him ships for money will sell him men for territory. His European territories may tempt Russia—his possessions in the West Indies, England—to assist him in the subjugation of his rebellious subjects. He may sell La Plata for Portugal, and the parties to the holy league may guaranty their respective cessions to each other. Shall we find in La Plata the unanimity, energy, and virtue, to resist such arrangements, where Province is arrayed against Province, under Puerrydon and Artega, viewing each other with a hostility more deadly than the proverbially mutual hatred of Spaniard and Portuguese? A still more fatal course may be pursued. The King of Spain may choose to try persuasion, giving to England the promise of free commerce with the Spanish Main; may he not easily procure another mediation, the condition of which shall be the conditional return of La Plata to her dependent state? England knew well how to make such a mediation effectual. Let it not be said her honor forbids it, or her interest. Her interest is promoted by the commercial monopoly such an arrangement will give. Her honor always bows obedient to the dictates of her commercial interest; if she should feel some qualms of conscience, the island of Cuba will calm her scruples. But has she ever promised more than to secure the commercial independence of Spanish America? What a contemptible figure should we make in the eyes of all mankind—how degraded in our opinions—if we should recognise La Plata, and the Government should shortly after voluntarily return to the Spanish yoke! That the Committee might not be deceived by the supposed attachment felt by the new Government for the United States—by the profession of an anxious desire to follow our example, and imitate our virtue, Mr. F. would mention a few facts, at once illustrating the ardor of their attachment to the United States, and the justice and honor of the Government in its dealings with individuals. The American brig Savage, of Baltimore, sailed to Buenos Ayres with a cargo of military stores; they there sold them to Government, to be delivered in Chili. The voyage was performed; four months elapsed, under various pretences, before the cargo was received, and after this delay the payment was made, not according to contract, but at the discretion of the Government. The owner was thus plundered of his property, and injured by this delay of his plunderers. The ship Enterprise, of Philadelphia, Captain Coffin, was employed, by contract, to carry three hundred exiles from Juan Fernandez to Valparaiso, from whence they had been formerly banished by the royal party. He was to have received $7,200. He performed his contract—restored the exiles to their country and their homes. After a detention of two months, he was paid $2,500—St. Martin, the Washington of America, as he is called, alleging that this was enough.

In the armies of La Plata, English and French officers are employed without scruple; Americans seldom, if ever. Our countrymen do not suit their manners, opinions, or Government. Juett, formerly of the Army of the United States, and Kennedy, formerly of the marine corps, sought in Valparaiso, in 1817, commissions in the army of St. Martin. He suspected them of attachment to the Carreras, and threw them into a dungeon, and whence they were not released until the captain of a vessel, who procured their liberation, entered into an engagement to take them immediately from a soil they were deemed unworthy to tread. To judge of the character of the nation, from the cruelty and harshness, or injustice, of an individual, was not reasonable; but when that individual was the theme of universal admiration in his own country, it could not be considered as improper to make him the standard by which to estimate the opinions and character of his countrymen.

Every arrival from this land of promise brings us the history of the oppressions of the existing Government, and the fearful forebodings of our countrymen, that the people, for whom our anxious wishes are hourly expressed, will derive no benefits from the change of their governors; that the Spanish power will be restored in all its rigor; or that the new authorities will ever be exercised with the same contempt of the principles of justice and of freedom, that distinguished the ancient tyranny. It might be urged, that this was newspaper information, derived from persons of doubtful authority. This objection was of the same force, in its application, to all the information possessed of that country. It was of such materials its history was composed. A powerful, an irresistible argument, to induce the Committee to refrain from the commission of an act of doubtful propriety, might be drawn from this source; but Mr. F. would not trespass longer upon their patience, exhausted as it must be, by attending to the long and animated address of the Speaker, and his own desultory reply.

When Mr. F. concluded his speech, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again, on the intimation of Mr. Lowndes, that he proposed to deliver his views of the subject.

And the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 26.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of John Johnson, Henry Perry, Richard Cravat, and Beley Cheney, the legal representatives of John McGrew, and the legal representatives of John Turnbull; which were twice read, and committed.

Mr. P., from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of James Mackay, of Missouri; which was twice read, and committed.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of John Small, was ordered to be read a third time, and was accordingly read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TERRILL, the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures were instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting the consent of Congress to an act passed by the Legislature of the State of Georgia, allowing fees to the health officer and harbor-master for the port of Darien.

On motion of Mr. J. S. SMITH, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing some other person than the President of the United States, to sign patents for soldiers' bounty lands.

On motion of Mr. FLOYD, the Secretary of the Navy was instructed to lay before this House the proceedings of the court martial held for the trial of Franklin Wharton, lieutenant colonel of marines.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, according to the direction of the House, certain statements in relation to the expenses of general courts martial since the first of August, 1812; which was ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of Cata Bunnell; an act concerning the bounty, or allowance, to fishing vessels, in certain cases; and, An act for the relief of Samuel Ward; in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

The first of the said bills from the Senate was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The second of the said bills was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

The last of the said bills was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims.

AMELIA ISLAND.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to the House of Representatives, in compliance with their resolution, of March the 20th, such information not heretofore communicated, as is in the possession of the Executive, relating to the occupation of Amelia Island. If any doubt had before existed of the improper conduct of the persons who authorized, and of those who were engaged in the invasion, and previous occupancy of that island; of the unfriendly spirit towards the United States, with which it was commenced and prosecuted, and of its injurious effect on their highest interests, particularly by its tendency to compromise them with foreign Powers in all the unwarrantable acts of the adventurers, it is presumed that these documents would remove it. It appears, by the letter of M. Pazos, agent of Commodore Aury, that the project of seizing the Floridas was formed and executed at a time when it was understood that Spain had resolved to cede them to the United States, and to prevent such cession from taking effect. The whole proceeding, in every stage and in all its circumstances, was unlawful. The commission to General McGregor was granted, at Philadelphia, in direct violation of a positive law, and all the measures pursued under it, by him, in collecting his force, and directing its movements, were equally unlawful. With the conduct of these persons, I have always been unwilling to connect any of the Colonial Governments; because I never could believe that they had given their sanction either to the project in its origin, or to the measures which were pursued in the execution of it. These documents confirm the opinion which I have invariably entertained and expressed in their favor.

SPANISH AMERICAN PROVINCES.

The order of the day on the unfinished business having been announced—

Mr. POINDEXTER moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill, in order to afford time for the documents expressly bearing on the question, yesterday communicated, to be printed and laid before the House.

After conversation respecting it, this motion was negatived.

The House then having again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the general appropriation bill; and Mr. CLAY's motion to insert an appropriation for a Minister to Buenos Ayres being yet under consideration—

Mr. LOWMYER addressed the House in a speech of about an hour and a half, in opposition to the motion.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana.—I should not have risen to express my opinion on the present occasion, if I had not, at an early period of the session, indicated my intention to do so, whenever a proper opportunity should occur; but for this circumstance, I should have been contented to give a silent vote, for I am well aware, from my more than usual ill health, that there will be nothing in either the manner or the matter of my address to compensate the Committee for that attention which their indulgence may induce them to bestow.

I unite with the gentleman from South Carolina in considering the proposition of the Speaker as involving in its decision the views of this House, in respect to the independence of the Government of Rio de la Plata, and as to the expediency of acknowledging it. On both these points, my opinions are formed, and I shall give them utterance, without equivocation or hesitation, notwithstanding certain cabalistic words, of great efficacy with old women, and men of weak minds, of the use of which the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. LOWMYER) has availed himself. I allude, sir, to his remarks on the danger of war, and the impropriety of casting censure on the conduct of the Executive.

I beg leave to assure the Committee, that I have no wish to involve the country in war; that I agree in everything my friend from South Carolina has said as to the inappreciable advantages of peace. I would even go further; I almost think that peace is necessary to the existence of liberty. Rarely indeed does the freedom of nations survive the expensive and bloody contests in which they are too prone to indulge; liberty, morals, prosperity, all depend upon peace; they are too precious to be wantonly hazarded; I would sanction no measure that would endanger them but under the most imperious circumstances. Nothing, too, is further from my intention than to censure the conduct of the Executive; so far from it, I wish to give to the President the strongest proof of my agreeing with him in opinion, by furnishing him with the means of executing his wishes in regard to the people of South America. Has he not told us, sir, that he feels the sincerest sympathy in their behalf, and has he not told us further that they were a people engaged in civil war, and entitled to equal rights with their enemies; and can it be otherwise than gratifying to him, that this House should concur in his views, and enable, nay, more, encourage him with the cheering influence of its approbation, to give effect to his benevolent and kind feelings, and to do justice to the revolutionists, by acknowledging their independence, sending them an Ambassador, and placing them in that situation of equality which, he says, they are entitled to enjoy? Sir, it cannot be otherwise than agreeable to the President to know the opinion of Congress on so momentous a subject; if that opinion, independently expressed, shall concur with his own, he will act conformably to it; on the other hand, if, from the position he occupies in the Government, from his better information, or from any other circumstances, unknown to the public, he shall think it best to continue, unchanged, the state of our relations with South America, he will do so. For one I shall not object, if he does but exercise his right to judge and decide for himself; and I am too much in the habit of pursuing my own opinion, to blame others, whether in public or private stations, for exhibiting a like independence.

But, the gentleman from South Carolina seems to contend, that it is the exclusive right of the Executive to manage our foreign relations; that he is better informed on these subjects, and that this House ought not to interfere so far as to suggest an opinion or a wish, unless it is meant to be understood, that strong disapprobation is felt towards the course which has been pursued. I think, too, it may be inferred from the remarks of the gentleman, that the President is not only better informed on all questions of this kind than Congress or the nation, but that it is right and proper that he should keep his information to himself, and not part with it too freely or too frequently. Now, I dissent from all such doctrine; I look upon it to be the duty of Congress to express its opinion freely upon all questions which concern our domestic or foreign affairs, and I consider it as the solemn duty of the Chief Magistrate of a popular Government to disseminate to the people all information that can instruct them on points so important as their situation in regard to other Governments.

I would ask, sir, how else can the wise measures of a virtuous administration receive rational approbation, or how a vicious Government be arrested in its mad career? Shall it be justified in managing in secret the whole interests of the public, in plunging into war after a long concatenation of events, which, if known, might have been prevented, or in allowing the nation to repose in security, when, from its own acts, or those of other Governments, it stands on the brink of a precipice? Ought there not rather, in such a Government as ours, to be the most unreserved and frank communication of facts, of whatever kind they may be? Ought there not to be felt and evidenced, towards the people, the most entire and unaffected confidence? Will the people long continue to confide in those who manifest distrust, by covering their proceedings, whether of an external or internal nature, with a veil of mystery and secrecy?

I cannot approve of the observations of the gentleman from South Carolina, and I do hope that the present Administration will act on no such principles. In the examination of the present subject, I shall not indulge myself in so wide a range as some of the gentlemen who have preceded me. I will endeavor to show that the Government of Rio de la Plata is independent, and that it is expedient to acknowledge that independence. To establish the fact of its independence, let us inquire whether it has declared itself independent? Of this there is no doubt; this fact is not disputed by any one. I state it thus, specifically, because it is far from being itself an unimportant circumstance. In our own case, it was not so considered. In the language of one historian, Ramsey, after that event "we no longer appeared in the character of subjects in arms against their sovereign, but as an independent people, repelling the attacks of an invading foe." And Marshall says, "we changed our situation by the Declaration of Independence, and were no longer considered as subjects in rebellion." From that time, too, we date our actual independence. It has not been permitted to be deferred till its acknowledgment by other nations, nor until the peace; and so has the fact been established, as well by political as judicial decisions, both in England and in the United States. Buenos Ayres remained faithful to Spain under circumstances extremely favorable to her throwing off the yoke. When the Peninsula was overrun by a foreign army and torn by domestic faction, the people of Buenos Ayres submitted to be governed as a colony; they were willing to continue their former connexion, while the Government was in the hands of Charles, or Ferdinand, or Juntas, having the semblance of power; but, when the whole of the Peninsula, except Cadiz, fell into the possession of France, they declared themselves independent; this was done by the Viceroy Cisneros. But the final and great act of 1816 flowed from the people; they then declared themselves independent of Spain and the Bourbons; established a Government for themselves, and have ever since enjoyed the most perfect exemption from everything like foreign control. They now appoint their own Executive Magistrate, their legislators, their judges, lay taxes, raise armies, and build navies, with which they not only secure their own independence, but diffuse that blessing over the neighboring Governments of Chili and Peru. They are more independent than we were at any one moment previously to the peace of 1783. Their soil is free from the pollution of a foreign hostile foot; and, if it be said that they have their factions, so had we ours. We had, in addition to our foreign foes, our Tories and domestic traitors. But it is objected that the provinces are not all united under one Government, and that Artigas is in possession of the province of Montevideo. But the possession of Artigas is not the possession of Ferdinand; the whole of the Banda Oriental is as free from his authority as Buenos Ayres itself; and the sole question at present is as to the independence of Rio de la Plata of its former European master. The freedom of Venezuela, New Grenada, and Mexico, is, unhappily, less assured; but they, too, have declared themselves absolved from the tyrant's yoke. Many years ago the Executive of the United States laid before this House the Constitution of Venezuela, and a resolution was adopted by the committee to whom it was referred, declaratory of the interest this House felt in their success, and promising to recognise them as independent when they should take a stand among the nations of the world. In regard to Buenos Ayres, that happy period has arrived; and it becomes us to realize the hopes to which our promises have given rise. The fate of New Grenada has been various; it has sometimes enjoyed self-government, and has been again subject to the temporary control of the usurpers of its rights. The gentleman from Georgia tells us, that Mexico has been preserved to the royal cause by its own native population; that it has not been found necessary to send over foreign troops to secure its allegiance to its sovereign. But the gentleman forgot to inform us that Mexico has been always filled with European troops, and that the number already there rendered any augmentation unnecessary. But for the Europeans in Mexico, a dissolution of its connexion with Spain would long ago have taken place.

But, sir, for what purpose has the gentleman from Georgia dwelt so long and so earnestly on the motives of the people of South America for declaring themselves independent, and on the manner in which the struggle has been conducted? The only question is, whether they are or are not independent. But the gentleman is as mistaken in his views on these subjects, as it is unkind in him, professing, as he does, to wish success to their cause, to pass their conduct, distorted as it is, in review before us, when nothing renders such investigation necessary. The gentleman says, that their revolution did not begin on principles favorable to individual liberty; but I would ask, sir, what revolution ever did? What revolution ever stopped at the point to reach which it commenced? What revolution, at its origin, ever advanced the principles on which, in its progress, it was conducted? What revolution ever terminated where the particular grievances were removed which gave it birth? A candid examination of our own history will sufficiently elucidate these views. We did not commence our contest with the mother country with any avowal, whatever might have been the intention of the intelligent and virtuous, of a wish to throw off colonial subjection; far from it; our professions of attachment and fidelity to the monarch were never before so frequent nor so strong. We complained of trifling grievances; proceeded cautiously to remonstrances, then to resistance; declared ourselves, after a lapse of some years, independent, and ultimately overturned the entire fabric of that Government, which, in the beginning, we so often praised, and merely affected to disapprove in some comparatively immaterial points. So the South American patriots act cautiously in regard to their former masters; profess, for a convenient time, entire devotion to their will, and take advantage of circumstances to effect the liberation of their country. But I acknowledge that individual freedom does not seem to be with their leaders a subject of sufficient concern, and perhaps on this point it is no more difficult to excuse them, than on that connected with their national independence. Let it be kept in view that they have two great objects to attain—the one, obnoxious to Spain, their national independence—the other, hateful to all Governments, except our own, individual liberty. As they, in common with all revolutionists, have found it necessary to mask their designs on the first point, so may it be politic in them to be as silent as possible in regard to the other. Where, throughout this enslaved world, are they to look for countenance or support, if they should dare to announce too openly their attachment to democratic forms of government? Will the combined despots of Europe smile upon their efforts? Can they look across the Atlantic for the cheering influence of approbation, when even here, in this Republic, they meet with cold indifference? Do they not perceive that the nations of Europe, although friendly to their independence, are hostile to their freedom? And may not this account, if it be true indeed, for the carelessness exhibited by them, according to the gentleman from Georgia, on the subject of individual rights?

But it is objected that the Provinces of La Plata are not united under one Government; and the gentleman from South Carolina suggests that whole districts of country are probably still subject to royal authority, or governing themselves independently of Buenos Ayres; this may or may not be the fact; but this is certain, that their distance, their want of population, their obscurity, are too apparent to have any effect on the present question. The gentleman from South Carolina adverts to a mistake of the Speaker, as to the number of the provinces of La Plata, and tells us that there are no more than thirteen, instead of twenty. Exclusive of the inconsequence of this difference, I would observe, that it is far from being certain that both the gentlemen are not in error. Like them, I have paid some attention to the geographical history of that country. My researches have led me to suppose that the Audiencia of Charcas, which includes the whole of the country sometimes called the Government of Buenos Ayres, and now the Government of Rio de la Plata, is divided into provinces, districts, and jurisdictions; that there are nine provinces, seven districts, and four jurisdictions—making twenty grand divisions, and some of these again are subdivided into smaller provinces. But it is not wonderful that these differences should exist on this and many other questions respecting Spanish America. It was the policy of the Royal Government to keep the world ignorant of that country, and to keep the inhabitants ignorant of each other. But, however all this may be, the inquiry as to the geographical diviion of Buenos Ayres, is of no importance in settling the question of its independence; this rests on broad facts, some of which I have mentioned, and which are known to the whole world; they establish the independence of the Government of Rio de la Plata beyond all dispute, and it remains now to be asked, whether we ought or ought not to acknowledge that independence? The first question that naturally presents itself, is, whether it is the custom of our Government to acknowledge the independence of independent nations? There is no doubt of this fact. Is there a monarchy in the world, whose independence we have not recognised, or are not prepared to recognise? However little they may merit respect; however insignificant they may be in the scale of nations; however odious the principles and practices of their Government, their Representatives are greeted here at Washington with an attention the most flattering. Have we not an Ambassador from Ferdinand? I mention him as an odious monarch; and have we not one also from Louis XVIII? And will it be for a moment contended, that Rio de la Plata is not more independent than France? Is Rio de la Plata in the possession of a foreign Power, and kept down by foreign bayonets, or is it self-governed? Yet France has her Representative here, while a more independent people are excluded from that attention and respect. Sir, if the Government of Rio de la Plata was monarchical, three months would not elapse before its independence would be recognised by the United States. I do not mean to say on account of its being monarchical; but in that case it would not be an object of hate and jealousy to the despots of Europe. They would acknowledge its independence, and we would then come in lagging on behind: we would follow their example. But the political institutions of that State are not legitimate; and, although the legitimates of Europe have no objection to their independence of Spain, they do object to their undertaking to govern themselves, without the paternal assistance of Kings. For my part, I should wish, on such an occasion, to take the lead; I would exult, as a Republican, in viewing my own Government proudly taking ground for itself, and disdaining the most indirect dictation, or even imitation, of their sacred Majesties of Europe. I should like to perceive among us a little more of that sympathy for Republics, which they so strongly feel for each other; and as I think their policy wise in surrounding themselves with Governments like their own, I cannot help being of opinion, that we should be strengthened by the establishment of free governments in this Western hemisphere. Justice to ourselves requires this course. We ought not to hazard the loss of the affections of a nation struggling to be free. If we are cold and indifferent towards them, finding themselves utterly abandoned, when they had a right at least to respect and countenance, they will adopt the principles which, however injurious to their civil rights, secure them the smiles of monarchs, and separate them from the internal despotism of Ferdinand. Sir, under circumstances much more perilous, we have acted with more manliness; we have disdained to be drawn from that course which a due regard to ourselves, as well as to others, required. When France rose in the majesty of her strength, and broke the chains of a monarch's sway; when the Kings of Europe, terrified and enraged, combined to strangle in its birth the infant freedom of the world; when, so far from recognising, they clad themselves in armor to annihilate the Republic; when our aristocratic Minister at Paris gave us to understand that an acknowledgment of the Republic would prove fatal to our own; then, even then, comparatively feeble as we were, destitute of the population and resources which we now possess, the Executive formed the magnanimous resolution to receive the French Minister.

I beg leave to call the attention of the Committee to the very words of the immortal man who then presided over the Executive department; they deserve to be deeply engraved on the memory of every American statesman. In a letter at that time written to Mr. Morris, our Ambassador at Paris, General Washington observes: "That the right of every nation to govern itself according to its own will; to change its Constitution at discretion, and to transact its business through whatever agents it might think proper, were principles on which the American Government itself was founded, and the application of which could be denied to no other people." Do we not deny the application of this principle to the people of Buenos Ayres? And if it be the principle on which our Government was founded, do we not abandon it? Were they not provinces like ourselves? Have they not changed their institutions and their agents? If the principle be true in respect to ourselves, is it not equally so in regard to others? And do they not present precisely the case, on the happening of which General Washington considers the recognition of them as necessarily growing out of the elementary principles on which our own Government stands?

Still, there was a party at that time opposed to the acknowledgment of the French Republic; the question whether a Minister should or should not be received, was submitted by the President to his Cabinet, as it is called. Mr. Hamilton and General Knox were opposed to receiving a Minister; Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Randolph in favor of doing so. General Washington, who had previously made up his own opinion, pursued the course recommended and sustained by the latter gentlemen. Mr. Genet was received. We did not wait for other nations to set us the example; we were not afraid of their displeasure, although they were all combined in arms to put down that Government; we acted as we chose, we acted as became the dignity of a free people; then the cry of danger, the alarm of war, which were incessantly rung in the ears of the public, were disregarded; we scorned the fear of punishment for exercising a right, for performing a duty. But it is a curious fact, and one that places our present course of procedure in a most singular and unfavorable aspect, that the policy of Washington was denounced as timid and unfriendly to France. The Republicans of that day, at the head of whom stood our two last, and our present Chief Magistrates, were dissatisfied with the coldness and indifference of the then President towards a people struggling to establish the great principles for which we had so nobly contended. Who were right and who were wrong, it is not for me to decide, but General Washington received a Minister from France, when a political war was waged against her by all Europe combined. He recognised that Republic when it was outlawed throughout all the world, when our population was comparatively small, when our resources were insignificant; while we, at the present day, when there is no war against the independence of the people of Buenos Ayres, while they are not denounced or outlawed, when indeed their independence would be to the interest of all other nations; when our strength, physical, and moral, is augmented to boundless resources; and above all, when there is no danger, we, I say, do not by any means go as far as that Administration, whose caution, as it was then called, was so offensive to the Republicans of that day; for what reasons and from what motives, I can neither comprehend nor conjecture.

But, although I have succeeded in proving the independence of Buenos Ayres, and in showing that it is agreeable to the usages of the United States to recognise the independence of independent Governments, yet it will be said that, in this case, we should deviate from our accustomed course, for fear of involving our country in war. If this were a sufficient reason, if it were very honorable to acknowledge ourselves deterred from doing what we have a right to do, from what we are accustomed to do, yet the reason is utterly unfounded in truth; for why are we to be involved in war, and with whom, no one can tell; there will be no war, there is no danger of war; in truth, war rages nowhere but in distempered imaginations.

Is it a cause of war that we acknowledge the independence of any Government whatever? It never was so considered. Consult jurists and historians—examine facts and theory—I venture to assert, that the simple recognition of independence, without aid or compact, was never deemed a cause of war, and never did produce it; the declaration of war by England against France, during our Revolution, has been frequently mentioned as proving the position for which our adversaries contend. A brief statement of facts will show how fallacious is such a conclusion. That France did not content herself with simply acknowledging our independence, but at the same time that she guaranteed that independence, and entered into treaties with us, that it was for her effrontery in making treaties with her revolted colonies that England resolved on vengeance, are facts as notorious as any in the history of that interesting era.

Ramsey tells us that, after the capture of Burgoyne's army, the King of France determined to take us by the hand and publicly to espouse our cause, and that our Commissioners at Paris, Franklin, Dean, and Lee, were informed by Mr. Garrard, one of the Secretaries of the Council of State, "that it was decided to acknowledge the independence of the United States, and to make a treaty with them; that his most Christian Majesty desired the treaty once made should be durable; that he was fixed in his determination not only to acknowledge, but to support their independence, and that the only condition he should require and rely on, would be, that the United States, in no peace to be made, should give up their independence, and return to their obedience to the British Government." Conformably with these preliminaries, Louis XVI., on the 6th of February, 1778, entered into treaties of amity, commerce, and alliance, with the United States, and became the guarantee of their sovereignty, independence, and commerce. The alliance between France and America was soon known to the British Ministry, and the King and Parliament resolved to punish France for treating with their subjects. It will not be denied that here there was cause enough for war; but how different from all this is the proposition for the simple recognition of the independence of La Plata! But from whom are we to apprehend war—from the Spaniards? The idea is too ridiculous to be for a moment entertained. The Administration has given them quite cause enough for war already, by taking possession of, and holding a part of their territory, and that, too, in spite of the protest of their Minister. We are at this moment, too, invading their country in pursuit of Indians; the truth is, they cannot make war against us, and our Government know it. How can they do so—have they troops to spare? Why, they are unable to send a single regiment against some of their provinces; and their troops in those where they have any are diminishing daily. I do think we are in no imminent danger from Spain; but perhaps France may resent our sending a Minister to La Plata. Poor France, trampled, humbled, and subdued—I will pass by her—but England may be disposed to chastise us, if we countenance the rebel Americans. Now, I will venture to assert that there is not an intelligent man in the United States, that does not know that England is as much interested in the independence of South America as we are, that she has done more to promote it, and that, from everything that we can observe, she is as liberal, in all respects, to the great cause in which they are engaged as we can pretend to be. We may hush our alarms on that score—England will not make war upon us; from the present state of Europe, I believe we shall not have another war with that nation; I am sure we shall not, unless for a better cause than our recognition of the independence of La Plata.

Mr. Chairman, the combined despots of Europe cannot, as formerly, indulge themselves in the royal sport of arms; they cannot wage wars of amusement or ambition; they are sufficiently employed in keeping their own subjects in subordination. Admirable as their Governments may be, something like coercion seems necessary to impress that opinion on the minds of their people. The armies of Europe are not now intended to guard against, or to make foreign conquests; they are to keep their inhabitants in slavery, and the kings on their thrones; three millions of soldiers in arms are all necessary for that purpose; they have no occasion to look abroad for employment; they need not come across the Atlantic. Sir, the impulse given to the human character by the American and French Revolutions still survives; the principles of despotism and superstition are dead—they do not suit the age; they may be sustained a little longer by the force of bayonets, but the love of liberty lives in the heart, will again before long have utterance, and ultimately succeed and triumph. Blind, indeed, must that man be, who does not see in the large standing armies of the Governments of Europe, the fear—the just fear—in which they stand of those whom they rule and oppress. Sir, we may manage our own affairs in our own way, without the fear of kings before our eyes. They have enough to do to keep things in order at home; their vigilance is more and more necessary every day; if they relax, they are hurled from their usurped dominion. I rejoice in this state of terror and alarm, and I most seriously wish that many years may not pass away before sufficient proof may be given that their fears are not unfounded and visionary.

But, sir, admitting, as is, on the main, generally admitted, that war would not be the consequence of sending a Minister to Buenos Ayres, yet it is contended that we have no interest, commercial or political, in their independence—indeed, it is pretended that it would be better for us, that they should continue in a state of colonial subjection. Sir, I feel an aversion seriously to combat so vile a proposition. I cannot believe that the happiness of others is incompatible with our own—such a principle does not enter into the great scheme of nature—it is the pitiful emanation of counting-house calculation, and is as untrue, as it is unworthy of anything but contempt. Sir, the independence of South America is the common cause of all commercial Powers—for the question is, whether its trade, by the subversion of its independence, will be again monopolized by Spain; or, by the establishment of it, laid open on equal terms to all the world; whether it is our interest to participate in the commerce of the colonial possessions of Spain, amounting in exports and imports to two hundred millions of dollars, or to be excluded from it entirely. This is the view of the subject; for it must not be forgotten that a return of these countries to the state of colonies, brings along with it the concomitant effects of the monopoly enjoyed by the Metropolitan government. The commerce which we now enjoy would be lost to us; and when we take into consideration the number of our vessels already engaged in trade with the Atlantic ports, as well as those with, and without licenses, interchanging their cargoes with those on the Pacific, we cannot even now doubt of its importance. Our navigation would be benefited by carrying for them a portion of their valuable productions to Europe, and returning to them the manufactures of that quarter of the world in exchange. In carrying our productions too, wherever we might obtain the means of purchasing commodities suited to their markets, our manufactures, too, if we become a manufacturing people, will then find additional demand; and I believe it may be also established, that our agriculture would receive essential benefit. It may be fairly assumed, that the price of the raw material will be enhanced in the proportion of the demand for the manufactured article; and the demand for the manufactured article depends upon the number, the wants, and the wealth of the consumers. Who can, then, deny that these facts depend materially upon the independence of South America? Independence will bestow upon the people every blessing—it will add to their numbers, to their industry, to their wealth, to their disposition and their ability to consume commodities, many of which will be manufactured from our raw materials—thus giving encouragement to agriculture; and, being conveyed to them by our vessels, adding to the prospects of commerce, and the prosperity of navigation. An estimate of the value of a free commerce ought not to be made from the present situation of this interesting and unfortunate people, depressed and poor, from the combined effects of superstition and despotism, habituated to privations, and ignorant of the importance of the world to them, or of themselves to the world. Their present value in the scale of nations is comparatively inconsiderable, yet their imports and exports exceed our own, and, when we reflect, under the colonial system, on the necessarily enormous price of imports purchased exclusively from Spain; or, if obtained in any other country, burdened and clogged with heavy duties, payable into the King's treasury, we may arrive at something like just conclusions. When looking into futurity, we find millions of slaves converted into freemen—their industry, their wealth, and their wants increased, the products of their labor augmenting in value, and the articles of their consumption diminishing in price. But I do not consider the direct pecuniary advantages to our country, however great and certain they may be, as of so much importance as the political and moral effects growing out of a liberal and manly policy towards that people. It will have a tendency to give us confidence in the firmness and virtue of Government—it will prove that it is not forgetful of the high character which belongs to us as a powerful and free people—that the reputation we have acquired, at the expense of so much blood and treasure, is not to be sacrificed by timidity or an undue spirit of accommodation towards the monarchs of Europe—that we will do what our principles require, in spite of imaginary terrors, artfully excited by the enemies of freedom—in fine, that, cautious of giving just cause of offence, we will pursue the path of fidelity and honor, in defiance of the views and wishes of those whose political institutions make them necessarily hostile to human happiness and human rights—that we dare at least do, what we are sustained in by right and truth, in favor of the liberties of mankind, without being deterred by those who promote, with unhallowed violence, at the expense of every sacred obligation, the dogmas of priestcraft, and the doctrines of despotism. And if we are asked by the officious and intermeddling representatives of kings, why it is, that we not only feel, but manifest sympathy for a people struggling to be free, let us refer them to their own unholy combinations, in support of the execrable principles of their government—let us tell them of their wars for thirty years past against liberty—that if the safety of monarchies in Europe depends on the annihilation of republics, the security of a republic in America will not be injured by other republics growing up by its side; and that, if they have presumptuously broken down, by force, whatever stood in the way of the establishment of tyranny, we may at least hope to be forgiven for going so far as to assert an abstract proposition in favor of freedom; for, sending or receiving a Minister from La Plata is no more.

Mr. Chairman, this firm and open course of conduct would be worthy of the excellence of the Government, which it is our pride and our boast to enjoy—it is due to ourselves. Gentlemen say, that the people of South America have no claims upon us. I do not advocate the measure under consideration, on any such ground. I do not believe, that the Government of La Plata has not only no claim upon us, but that they wish from us nothing but an acknowledgment of their independence—a measure, in justice, due as much to ourselves as to them. It gives me much pleasure to believe, that they neither wish nor require our aid. We have nothing that they want—they have money and arms, and a brave population, resolved to be free. They only wish to be placed, by a Republic, on a level with other established Governments. This we do not refuse to monarchies, and we ought to exult in an opportunity of being the first to do so in regard to a people, like ourselves, freed from the yoke of colonial vassalage. In the event of future wars, the political character of South America will be of much importance. If they are reduced to colonies, or seduced by the flattering attention of Kings, and driven by the cold neglect of the United States to adopt monarchical institutions, their weight, their wealth, their boundless resources, may all add to the torrent which may threaten to overwhelm us—but should they all ultimately prevail not only in establishing independence, but free Government, we, instead of Europe, would enjoy these advantages, or at least the negative benefit of their neutrality. That the commerce and independence of millions of individuals, occupying a country abounding in the richest productions of the world, should be unimportant and uninteresting to us, is an idea far beyond the reach of my comprehension. Such an opinion must grow out of an obliquity of views and perversity of intellect, peculiar to the few by whom it is entertained.

In the progress of this debate, sir, I have been very forcibly struck with a circumstance which I proceed to mention: The gentleman from Georgia is much alarmed at the strong and fearful proposition of the Speaker. And the gentleman from Georgia tells us, that he is decidedly in favor of taking possession of Florida, whilst the gentleman from Kentucky, on the other hand, objects to the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia, as being infinitely too hostile, and fraught with the very dangers improperly attributed to his own; whilst a large majority of the Committee seem to object to the propositions of both the gentlemen on the score of their belligerent character. Now, for myself, I think my course is clear. I agree with both the gentlemen—I would send a Minister to Buenos Ayres, because we have a right, and it is our duty to do so, and I think it also a harmless and inoffensive measure. And I would take possession of Florida—I would give the Executive efficient support—I would enable them, after having so clearly and so fruitlessly established our claims against Spain, to do the nation justice. I would prove to the world, that the many grievances of which we have for so many years so bitterly complained, were really felt; that the debt which was demanded, was really due, and that it should be paid. I would not suffer these things, so important to the rights and the character of the United States, to exist any longer as mere themes for diplomatic dexterity and discussion—I would after 15 or 18 years cease to write or talk about them—I would sequester the adjoining territory of Spain, till she agreed to do us justice—I would take Florida from Ferdinand, and give the same reasons for doing so as those which had induced us to take Amelia Island from the patriots. I would say it is an asylum for runaway negroes; that it is a means by which Africans are smuggled into the Southern States; that it furnished facilities for the violation of our laws, to the serious injury of our revenue; all these facts are as true in relation to the other parts of Florida as to Amelia Island, and true to a much more mischievous extent. But in addition to these reasons, I would state others exclusively applicable to Florida. Is not Florida filled with a population the most horrible to encounter, composed of negroes and Indians, who carry desolation and death among our frontier inhabitants? And is not Spain bound, by the solemn stipulation of treaty, to preserve us from the destruction which she now so calmly witnesses? Are the wrongs of our citizens, and the enormous expense to which we are driven to protect them from further injury, unworthy of consideration?

I would then take possession of Florida; and I would take possession of it openly, and above board: I would approach the subject by no indirect course; I would act in the face of the world; supported by conscious rectitude, I would be prepared to meet whatever consequences might ensue. And it is not the great and unholy destroyers of the independence of nations in Europe, those who have reduced to their dominion whomsoever they pleased, wherever situated, whether in America, Europe, Asia, or Africa, from whom I should apprehend reproof. Their conduct in regard to others, has indeed been black; ours would stand the test of the most scrutinizing examination. I think their objections might be successfully met by a short catalogue of their own acts; a concise recapitulation of their own ambitious and iniquitous practices.

Having now, Mr. Chairman, however unsuccessfully, attempted to show that the Government of La Plata is independent; that it is agreeable to common usage to acknowledge the independence of independent Governments, that such acknowledgment is not a just cause of war, and in this case could not produce it, I cannot but hope that the proposed appropriation will be agreed to. It will be considered by the world as an expression of the opinion of the Representatives of the people of the United States, on a subject of great importance; it will be considered in no other light. It is ridiculous to connect it with what the President has done or said; it will be viewed under a more important aspect—it will evidence the deep interest which is felt by the people of North America in the situation of their brethren of the South; it will add in after ages to our fame and honor; it will show that we at least are not indifferent to the political fate of man. Sir, I feel a warm interest in the future prosperity of South America; it ought not to remain in its present debased and humbled state. Nature has done too much for it to intend that all the blessings it has bestowed should be bestowed in vain; that its beneficent plan should be marred by a capricious tyrant. The diversity of its climates, its various productions, its peculiarly happy situation, lying between the other quarters of the world, with ports on the Atlantic and Pacific oceans; its large rivers and fertile soil, all give it a distinguished station in the universe. But, sir, it is said by the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. FORSYTH,) that its inhabitants are at present neither free nor fit for the enjoyment of freedom. I do admit, sir, that despotism has done much to disqualify them for the enjoyment of their rights, but I will not believe that they are intended, by an all-wise Providence, to remain the slaves of kings and priests. I believe, I hope the gentleman is mistaken; I do hope that we are not the sole depository of all the freedom that survives—the ark that floats alone on the universal deluge.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland.—The motion now under consideration, is to appropriate a salary and outfit for a Minister to La Plata. This course of conduct on the part of Congress would be novel and wholly unprecedented. The Constitution has given to Congress legislative powers—to the President the direction of our intercourse with foreign nations. It is not wise for us to interfere with his powers; his plans may be digested with wisdom; our interference might destroy them, and, perhaps, at the moment when they would otherwise have succeeded. Each branch had better confine itself to the duties assigned it by the Constitution. Much offence was given by the President, by an opinion expressed, with the best motives, in his Message, as to the powers of Congress to construct roads and canals. The Speaker expressed his sentiments on the subject, conceiving it to be an improper interference of our legislative rights—as giving weight to the arguments of those who concurred with the President on the Constitutional question. Is the motion now before you intended as a retaliation? Are we about to direct him in his duty, and to tell him what he ought to do? No, said the gentleman last up, (Mr. ROBERTSON,) we mean only to sustain him. I do not find that he requires us to sustain him; he appears to have taken his course, as it respects the colonies of Spain, with judgment and caution. He appears to have a sincere desire that those colonies should become independent, but he wishes first to know their true position. He does not think the information he possesses is sufficient. We are called upon to recognise the independence of La Plata, and upon what information? Certainly none sufficient to enable us to make up a wise decision on a subject so very important. No two gentlemen agree upon the state of the country, or the form of Government. We know not whether it is a Republic, such as ours, of the people; whether it is a military Government, or one by Dictator. But we are told by my friend, (Mr. ROBERTSON,) that we should pursue the course of conduct adopted by General WASHINGTON with the French Republic. Well, Mr. Chairman, we consent. Did Congress, on that occasion, direct the conduct of General WASHINGTON? Did that Congress tell him, that he did not understand what he ought to do, and that they would instruct him? No, sir, they left him to exercise the powers vested in him by the Constitution—to the exercise of his own judgment; they sustained him by no act. Let us act in like manner by the present Chief Magistrate; he has not asked for our assistance—he has asked no outfit for a Minister to La Plata; when he does, it will be time to consider the subject.

The Executive is charged with an indifference—a negligence—towards the cause of the patriots. I cannot discover any; on the contrary, it is well known that, about six or seven years past, an agent, of intelligence, was sent to La Plata; that he travelled through all that country and Chili, and remained some years in those colonies; another agent is now there; and lately three commissioners have been sent by the present Executive; their object, to judge of the state of the new Power, of its capacity to maintain its independence, and to procure such other information as may enable our Government to form a correct opinion before we act. Why, then, not wait their return? Why precipitate a decision, before we are possessed of such authentic information as will justify a step that may involve the nation in war? The Speaker has told us that recognition is not cause of war, but that aid is cause of war; and he has referred us to the revolt from Spain of the United Provinces of Holland, and to our own glorious Revolution. Let us examine the facts. When Queen Elizabeth recognised Holland she granted aid, at the same time she pursued no half-way measures—she generally acted with decision. How did France act towards us? In May, 1776, she sent an agent to London to confer with Arthur Lee; he informed Mr. Lee that the Court of France wished to send us an aid of 200,000 louis-d'ors in specie, arms, and ammunition, and what he wanted to know was, to what island it was best to make the remittance; that, to give it the appearance of a mercantile transaction, a small quantity of tobacco should be sent in return, as a cover, but that the remittance was gratuitous. It is well known that Beaumarchais (the French agent) drew from the public arsenals of the King, cannon, arms, and clothing, for twenty or thirty thousand men, and that they were actually shipped in September, October, and November, 1776; they were delivered to Beaumarchais, as if he had been a merchant, and he gave his assurance that they should be replaced; and he actually received from the King one million of livres in June following, which has been thought by many was to enable him to purchase and replace the military stores drawn by him from the public arsenals. The great aid of military stores and money, say three millions of livres, afforded by France to the United States, we know was known to England. The King of France, in his letter to the King of Spain, dated 8th January, 1778, says distinctly, "England has taken umbrage at those succors, and has not concealed from us that she would be revenged on us sooner or later." Those succors were given in 1777, were known to England, yet she did not go to war on that account; but soon after De Vergennes had declared to Lord Stormont, that France had recognised the independence of the United States, had authorized a commerce with those States, and were determined to protect it, war was declared. Here, then, it appears that the recognition was the cause that England did actually go to war. Holland gave us no public aid whatever; she even forbade us to ship munitions of war from her European ports; but she permitted our merchants to obtain supplies, and to trade openly with her colonies of St. Eustatia and Curacao. When Mr. Laurens was taken, his papers were saved before they sunk, and a recognition of our independence (perhaps a treaty) by Holland being found among them, war was immediately declared against her by England. From these facts I am induced to form an opinion, that recognition is a cause of war.

A comparison has been drawn to our disadvantage between the conduct of France towards us, when we were struggling for our independence, and our conduct towards the patriots of South America. Let us examine the subject with candor. France covertly permitted arms, &c., to be taken out of her arsenals for our use; she openly forbade her ports to our trade; would not admit our flag to fly in her European ports; but the secret agent (Beaumarchais) procured a private permission from the Farmer General to permit them entry. How differently have we acted towards the patriots? Our Government, for causes into which I will not inquire, made sale of a large quantity of arms to the merchants, who publicly shipped them, and arms bought from individuals, together with powder and other munitions of war, to South America, and thus took the lead of all other nations, in substantially aiding the patriots in their struggle for independence. The laws admitted all people freely to enter our ports and trade; the President might have permitted the laws silently to operate; he did more; he issued orders, lest any difficulty should arise, to the collectors to admit the vessels and flag of the patriots to entry; and I think the Spanish Minister protested without effect against that conduct. From this view of our conduct, I do not think we can justly be charged with doing less for the patriots than we ought to have done, or than France did for us.

The Speaker has given us a correct geographical view of the Spanish colonies, commencing with Mexico. He describes that colony as capable of producing some articles similar to the produce of the United States, particularly tobacco; but comforts us with his belief, that the people, not having heretofore produced it in such quantities as to interfere with us in foreign markets, they will not when they become independent. The Speaker knows that the article of tobacco was a monopoly in the Crown, and that its culture was confined to particular districts of country by the laws, and that little more than necessary for the mother country and colonial consumption was allowed to be raised; that a free export was not permitted. But when an independent Government shall be established, which I sincerely wish, new excitement will take place; agriculture will be free from all shackles; commerce will be open to all nations, and those oppressed people will make use of all the means that their fertile land will afford; and why should they not? Why wish them free and independent, and indulge a wish that their industry should be paralyzed, lest it should interfere with our interests? The Speaker has forgotten that the table lands of Mexico produce, in great abundance, the finest wheat; that flour is exported from La Vera Cruz; and that, if the people were encouraged, they could spare large quantities.

Mr. Chairman, I see, sir, that the Committee is impatient. I shall pass over New Grenada and Venezuela, and apply my observations to the object of the mission under consideration, to wit, La Plata. In a commercial point of view, of what service is La Plata to us? Of very little in time of peace; the produce of that country is the same as our own, to wit: breadstuffs, cotton, tobacco, &c. I know no article we can export to La Plata, except munitions of war; of them they have now a superabundance. In time of peace and tranquillity, they will not want even those articles. From La Plata we can import hides and tallow, the Speaker says, and specie. I believe they have no mines, and the specie procured by them is from Peru; they generally, however, have had a large amount of specie in circulation, and, of course, it may be procured—but how? We cannot get their specie, hides, and tallow, without having something with which to pay for them; we can send nothing from our own country to buy specie, and the nations whose manufactures suit the people supply them direct, on better terms than we could do indirectly. The Speaker very justly observes, "that the ingenuity and enterprise of the merchants is very great; and he trusts that they will find some circuitous mode of arriving at the means by which the specie may be procured at La Plata; that the merchants have been under the necessity of calling at some European port for specie for the India and China trade;" and this is true, but then the ships always carried cargoes, on which the owners expected to make a freight to pay the expenses of the intermediate voyage. The difference in the price of specie between the market of Europe, and that of Buenos Ayres, would not pay the expense and loss of time that would happen to a vessel bound to India, for stopping at that port, and it would scarcely be an object for a vessel to go in ballast from the United States with bills of exchange to purchase hides and tallow; the distance is too great. Few of our merchant vessels frequent Buenos Ayres; and the merchants who have had funds there lately, have been under the necessity of employing English vessels, in many instances, to bring the hides and tallow of that country to this.

The Speaker has informed us that the people of La Plata cannot become a navigating people; and, of course, they can never interfere with our carrying trade. He says, they are too near the sun to become seamen. I have always understood that navigation had its origin among the people who lived in warm climates. The Malays live directly under the sun, and are believed to have carried on navigation in former times, throughout the whole of the Indian seas; their language was a kind of Lingua Franca, when the Portuguese first discovered the way to India. The Arabs filled at that time, although near the sun, all the ports of India. Tyre and Carthage are both nearer the sun than Buenos Ayres; and their people were the greatest navigators of the then known world; but Buenos Ayres is, I believe, no nearer the sun than we are at this moment. It is in about the same latitude south that the Chesapeake is north. La Plata will support her independence; and, I hope, will (when at quiet) establish a good form of Government. If it be a Government of the people, the mind will be free to act, and the consequence must be, that they will, in a few years, have ships of their own. Yes, sir, they will build ships; will extend their commerce, and will become their own carriers. Why should we doubt it? Who would have supposed, in 1790, that the United States would in 1806 have been the second navigating people in the world; that we should at this time have nearly one million and a half of tons of merchant vessels, including the coasting vessels. This great increase is owing to our free Government and wholesome laws. With such a Government, the people of La Plata will soon be a navigating people, and in twenty or thirty years, may have a fleet equal to that we now have; and, if they should, we may at some future day defend the liberty of the seas, acting in concert.

The Speaker has said that Spain cannot go to war—that her finances are in too ruinous a state. He tells us that he derives this information from Mr. Garey, the Minister of Finance, who has drawn a picture of their finances, not unlike that of Mr. Dallas's report of the finances of the United States. Yes, sir, Mr. Dallas boldly told us our situation, and we profited by knowing the truth. Mr. Garey has as boldly told the truth to the King of Spain, and what has been the consequence? Why, the King has lessened the public expenses, by discharging a host of custom-house officers; for every town in the interior of Spain had its custom-house; now they are only to be seen on the exterior of the Kingdom. But the great object of Mr. Garey was to show the King the indispensable necessity of compelling the nobility and clergy to pay their fair proportion of the public burdens. The King has done so. This has brought in a large addition to the treasury. The clergy had remonstrated, but without effect. I state these facts to affirm the observation of the gentleman from South Carolina, to wit: that we ought not to place too great a reliance on the defect of the finances of a nation of whose resources we know so little. They must be low indeed, if in our recognition of one of her colonies, Spain does not declare war. The Speaker tells us, truly, that if Spain should declare war, her possessions—to wit: Cuba, Florida, and Mexico—will be endangered. I have no doubt they would, for I presume we should not carry on a quasi war. We could do Spain little injury at sea, for she has very few vessels afloat. Our commerce, however, would be greatly exposed on the ocean. Our flag floats on every sea, and unprotected (as it would be,) would afford an abundant harvest for the privateers that would be put to sea from Spain, manned by the seamen of all nations, and owned by the merchants of many of the European Powers. And in return for the sacrifice of our commerce we would take Florida, might attack Cuba, and carry our arms into Mexico, through I know not how many hundred miles of wilderness. These would be extensive enterprises, and not a little expensive. The success would be doubtful. At least, you could not attempt such a conquest with less than twenty or thirty thousand men. If the Mexicans joined your army, there might be a chance for success; if not, fear of your army would ever return. I do not find that any gentleman has thought of providing the means for war. In case the motion should obtain, no one has an idea of renewing the taxes that we have lately repealed. No, sir; we take a step that would compel any nation to declare war that had the means. We comfort ourselves by saying that Spain cannot go to war, and therefore all preparations on our part are unnecessary.

The Speaker has given himself much trouble to convince the Committee that England will not take part in a war, on the side of Spain, against the United States. Why, sir, England has commenced many foolish wars; but I cannot believe she would commit so great a folly. Spain and the United States at war—Great Britain neutral! What would be the consequence? Insurances in American ships and seamen's wages would rise.—Freights could not be carried on equal terms; and English ships of course would become the carriers of all the produce of the United States, while our vessels would be laid up to rot at our wharves; your sailors would be compelled to go into foreign service—they would be lost to their country and to our Navy; no youths would be trained to the sea. A war with England would be preferable to a war with Spain, and England neutral. England would be precisely in the situation that we were for many years of the late wars—to wit: carriers for all Europe.

Mr. Chairman, I recollect to have seen, many years ago, a print. The principal object was a beautiful cow. In her front were two men—one in white, the other in scarlet; swords drawn, and fighting most furiously, while a fat Hollander sat with a milk-pail under the cow, milking quietly, and looking up at the combatants with a smile, mixed with pleasure and contempt, at their folly. In case we get to war with Spain, the Englishman will milk the cow, and with justice laugh at our folly.

It may not be improper, Mr. Chairman, to look at our trade with Spain. We annually export to the dominions of Spain eight millions five hundred thousand dollars value of property—to wit: four millions five hundred thousand domestic produce, and four millions foreign—nearly the whole of which is carried in our own vessels. The domestic consist of bulky articles, and require a large quantity of tonnage, in proportion to their value; they consist of tobacco—principally from Kentucky; that kind is preferred in Spain to any other, except their own colonies—flour, rice, Indian corn, fish, naval stores, lumber, peas, beans, furniture, carriages, boots, shoes, hats. And, in addition to the above value, a number of vessels are annually sold to the Spaniards. We risk all this valuable commerce by the motion. And what article can we supply La Plata with, in case she becomes free? I have already stated, that I do not know one solitary article of our produce that could be sold for first cost in La Plata. We have just been relieved from an expensive war, and have a large debt to discharge. The people are happy and content—they have been relieved from the direct and internal taxes—and I am not willing to do any act that may lead us into a war, and make it necessary again to impose similar or perhaps higher taxes on my constituents.

We are gravely told by the Speaker, that there is no difficulty in appropriating for a foreign mission to a Monarch, but one to a Republic is not so easy to obtain; that our Government cringes to crowned heads, and had sent to Sweden and Holland Ministers Plenipotentiary, when those Governments had only sent Chargés d'Affaires to the United States; and that our Government had acted in like manner towards all the Monarchs of Europe. Mr. Chairman, if I recollect correctly, those acts were done during the time of Mr. Madison, nor did I know that they had ever before met the Speaker's disapprobation; on the contrary, I should have believed they had been approved by him. However, the Speaker will be pleased to know that both will soon return. No Minister has yet gone to Austria, although, it is well known that the Emperor is anxious to encourage our commerce to his dominions. Denmark has had a Minister in the United States for many years; our Government has not returned the compliment. Holland sent a Minister Plenipotentiary to the United States (Mr. Chauguion) and in return the late President sent a Minister of equal grade. Holland withdrew her Minister, and sent a Chargé, and I understand the present President means to act in like manner. It appears thus that no censure attaches to the President now in office, on that subject. The Speaker tells us that Prussia has sent a Minister to the United States, and that our Government will return the compliment; and for what? he asks. Prussia, he says, has only two miserable ports on the Baltic. The Speaker forgets that Prussia has lately obtained Swedish Pomerania, and enjoys a seacoast of more than sixty miles, from Mecklenburg to the confines of Russia, including many noble ports; among the number, the great city of Dantzic, the Stralsund, Königsberg, Stettin, and Memel; that we draw from Prussia linens of all kinds, to a large amount, and pay her in tobacco, cotton, sugar, coffee, and tea, and other articles of our surplus importations; and yet I have not understood that our Government intends to send a diplomatic agent there immediately.

Mr. Chairman, it is the duty of the President to endeavor to extend the commerce of our country; and whenever he can do so by the sending of a Minister, I believe he will. It might be important to send a mission to Constantinople, and by treaty cause our vessels to be admitted on equal terms with other nations; at present they are not.

Mr. Chairman, I think I have shown that the conduct of our Government towards the patriots of South America, has been liberal and proper; that recognition by France and Holland of the independence of the United States, was the cause of England declaring war, and of course that recognition is considered as cause of war. I have endeavored to show that we have not yet such information as to the situation of La Plata, as would justify us in taking a step that would probably lead to war; that the President has pursued the proper course to obtain correct information, and that it is prudence to wait the return of the Commissioners before we act.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, rose, for the purpose of offering his view of this interesting subject, to the consideration of the Committee, in support of the amendment proposed by the honorable Speaker; and said, as he knew the House must be weary at this late hour of the day, the only apology he could make, was, that he would not detain them long. I am, said he, strongly impressed with a belief that an appropriation of this kind would well comport with the disinterested views of this Government, and would enable the President at any time to do justice to this Republic, which has achieved an object so glorious to itself, and of such signal benefit to mankind. The present is a favorable moment, when our affairs are prosperous and quiet—the world calm, and no political ebullitions to distract us. This would be the safe course—the dignified course—dictated by the true policy of the United States, and one calculated to free them from the odious doubts and suspicions of partiality, which have been cast upon them, and would place their conduct in a high point of view, both for magnanimity and justice.

The spectacle presented to our view is sublime and wonderful; a brave people, disdaining the shackles of a foreign despot, wading through rivers of blood to erect their constitution upon a firm basis, which will secure to them the enjoyment of personal liberty, and give them a stand among the nations of the earth, as free and independent. Through the storms of revolution, their institutions have been purified. Warring now to maintain their freedom, they appealed to this nation for justice, and ought to have demanded our attention. This nation, free as air, cannot envy the enjoyment of the world besides, will bestow a part of its deliberations upon that appeal; nor now refuse to listen to the dictates of justice, of policy, or to the cries of suffering humanity, in adopting this amendment; that the appropriation may be made; that justice be dealt out with an even hand—as I should be sorry to believe the United States could at any time so far forget the great principles of equal rights, equal liberty, and equal law, as to give the smallest grounds for complaint to any nation, and surely the situation of these people entitles them to this appellation.

The civil dissensions which for some time so convulsed the Spanish monarchy, have at length assumed a determinate shape, and war is now no longer the war of revolution, or a civil war, but the efforts of contending Governments. This young Republic, powerful in its resources, recovering with renewed vigor from every disaster, believes herself justified by the law of nations, in demanding a recognition of her rights as a free and independent nation.

Spain, bloated with pride, inherited through a long line of ancestors, is incapable of imitating the noble and magnanimous conduct of Great Britain, who, after seven years of war with us, came forward as Great Britain ought to have done, and acknowledged our independence. Yet that Monarch, who boasts the sun never sets upon his dominion, parts with reluctance from the smallest piece of soil, and wars by withholding his assent to independence, when hostilities have ceased, through inability to prosecute them. Mis-table: she is, without resources, without finances, bankrupt at home, that monarchy still lingers, like the gaulester, upon the delusive hope that a fortuitous concurrence of circumstances may again bring under her dominion half a revolted world.

And now we are told by the honorable chairman of the Committee of Foreign Affairs (Mr. FORSYTH) that he is unwilling to make the recognition, because it will interfere with our dispute with Spain. Surely that ought not to weigh with him from whom, recollecting his declaration a few days ago on this floor, it is expected some strong measure will be proposed with regard to Spain. Is it a declaration of war? then why should he oppose this recognition? Is it a proposition to take possession of Florida? Why in that case should he oppose it? rather ought it to be a cogent reason for adopting this measure. Yet, inadequate as Spain is, to a task so unequal as that of reducing a Government fully organized since their revolution, and exercising the rights of sovereignty for years, building fleets, raising and equipping armies, and marching them to distant provinces to finish there a work which themselves had consummated—notwithstanding these strong and decided proofs of independence, exhibited in the fullest powers of government, unmolested by hostile troops within their territory, still we hear of Europe; as if, to measure justice, we should consult the frowns or smiles of another continent!

From some cause or other, lively apprehensions have arisen in the mind of the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means (Mr. LOWMEYER) that an acknowledgment of this kind might involve us in national difficulties. Can he, of all others, who is so well acquainted with laws of nations, hint this result of an acknowledgment, admitted by all the writers on that law, to be no cause of war? Whilst I would, with the most scrupulous care and exactness, avoid what might endanger the tranquillity of my country, I would likewise avoid whatever might give a pang to this budding Republic; and if to pursue the right, and administer strict impartiality and justice, cannot secure to this nation her amicable relations undisturbed, it would be madness or folly in the extreme, to believe any course free from the dangerous tempests which so often arise from mistaken policy as conflicting interests. I am sorry that gentleman (Mr. LOWMEYER) has insinuated that the proposed measures was in hostility to the Executive; it is to be lamented that any such opinion should have escaped him; from his usual benevolence it was not expected, and if anything has been contemplated of that kind, he might have spared those who advocate the measure from honest convictions. But against any such motive for myself I utterly protest, nor do I believe any such motive to have actuated the honorable member of the proposition. I have been impelled by the convictions of my own mind, and, whilst ever I have the honor of a seat in this House, such only will govern me.

In this fear of giving offence, and this zeal to convince the nations of Europe of the rectitude of our intentions, are we not bound to take care of the interests of America, that she should not complain? As she has already been considered, and that too by high authority, as engaged in civil war, a situation in which all know, that in justice each party is entitled to equal rights and respect; and, as seems manifest, warring to maintain an independence which she has already wrested from the iron grasp of oppression, and ought to be regarded by the world as the germ of general emancipation. Clear as these facts seem to be, we are told, with a doubtful inquiring look, as if listening for danger, that we are observed by Europe, and that we should not excite their jealousy or distrust, as if the justice of nations was the result of fear; I know, too, there are many excellent men whose feelings are enlisted for these brave patriots, struggling against a Power which still annoys them, who pause in their decision because this Hydra Europe is constantly presented to their view. Sir, it will be a black and sorrowful day to this Republic, when this imaginary course of Europe is to be held over its deliberation like a lash of scorpions to goad it on to anything or stop it in its course. Can that alarm the nations of Europe which is bottomed upon the law of nations, since they have been so lately engaged in apportioning that plundered continent, without consulting our jealousies or our fears? For my own part I cannot imagine such fears—radically inimical as I am to an interest which of late had nearly involved us in ruinous difficulties; I have too high an opinion of the quick sagacity of the British cabinet, not to believe they would discern their own unequivocal interest in doing this act of justice. The fears of Europe! What can the petty States of Italy fear from our acknowledging the independence of the Republic of La Plata? These wretched Governments, enveloped in the legitimate fogs of Europe, are unseen in the scale of nations. What can Russia fear? Surely none can be so politically bewildered, as to believe she can fear anything; she has her views nearer home; with a boundless extent of territory, comprising one-twenty-eighth part of the whole surface of this huge globe—a population so vast as to overturn, like a resistless torrent, everything which opposes it; still anxious to extend her dominions to the South, and acquire territory on the Mediterranean; she will before long give employment to her neighbor there, and it were well for the Powers of Europe to look to their own safety in time. Could England view a measure of this kind with jealousy or suspicion, when at this very instant efforts are making throughout Europe, not loud, but deep and dangerous, to exclude from their markets every species of her manufactures? Witness the conduct of France, Holland, Sweden, Russia, and other Powers, as it regards the cotton manufactures. Witness the large private associations in these countries, binding themselves by the solemn obligation of an oath, to use their every effort to exclude from their country the use of British fabrics of every description. This, sir, is a continental system more terrible to England, or soon will be, than all the colossal power of the Great Napoleon, enforcing the same object. Is it not rather her true interest to support this infant Power, even with arms, where she will find a tenfold market for her merchandise, unrivalled, and increasing perhaps for one hundred years? These then are the only Powers which have any concern in these events. The rest of Europe is a mere mockery upon the independence of nations. Germany and Sweden, with her Bernadotte, anything Russia pleases, and Prussia almost an appendage—Holland and Portugal at the disposal of England; and Spain, reposing in the embroidered arms of the adored Ferdinand, dissolving by a political hectic, unpitied by the world; and France, lately the gaze of admiring millions, guided by the overwhelming genius of her Emperor, is now little else than the great garrison of Europe, with a pageant King in splendid misery in the midst of it.

But Russia, true to her own interest, has not been inattentive to the great events which have been evolving themselves in South America; her attempt to acquire territory on the Gulf of California, and even, if the news be true, upon our very borders, is a proof of this; she is willing to acquire territory by every change, and every event, for territory has been the hereditary mania of her monarchs. Unwilling to commence hostilities at all times, disappointment only results in new efforts on new objects, at distant and different points, which must eventuate, if permitted by the Powers of Europe silently to progress, in her controlling the commerce of the world. England, actuated by different motives, has approved, by her conduct, and fostered those brilliant successes, by which the patriots of South America have raised to fame a column of glory so bright, as to shed a blaze of renown over half the world, and has embalmed forever the name of her heroes.

What have we done? The honorable chairman of the Committee of Foreign Affairs (Mr. FORSYTH) tells us that the patriots captured a vessel belonging to a citizen of the United States, and refused others employment in their service; that the only sympathy felt is felt by us; that the sympathy is all on our side. Then, sir, I must say they are languid indeed! for instead of those vivid sympathies which should have watered with our tears the rosy bed of immortality, on which sleep many of the heroic defenders of that Republic, we passed an act, like an one-eyed warder upon the watchtower, who sees only on one side, and calls out "all is well," whilst danger and ruin nearly approaches on the other. Sir, if our apprehensions prevent us from doing them justice, let them not induce us to do injustice; let us not impede their high destinies by a law which operates unequally, since that wonderful wisdom which willed the destiny of empires hath willed it so, for the happiness of America and the safety of Europe; else if Spain, a few little years ago, had seen on her throne a monarch such as he who now sways the ponderous sceptre of Russia—a man whose talents and sagacity were equal to the population, the wealth, and the extent of her dominions—the crash of falling thrones would have resounded throughout Europe, and their legitimacy, instead of a protocol, would have been thundered from her cannon's mouth. If, Mr. Chairman, the United States shall turn from this question, other nations will not; England, more generous than we, will do them justice, and reap the fruits of their grateful benedictions. These colonies, for a long time settled for the purposes of commerce, had no political existence, or any part in the great agitations of the world—too distant from the mother country to feel anything of national prejudices or predilections, they have become a new people, under the influence of a different climate, where the productions, the scenery, the physical conformation of the country, and even the very sky and the stars of heaven are so different, that nothing of the Spaniard is left but the name, and that now no more.

In vain has the fond remembrance of their forefathers endeavored to cherish the recollections of their youth, by giving to the hills, the valleys, the rivers, and mountains, of their adopted country, the names of the places of their childhood. These names no longer produce a forceful feeling; the heart has ceased to vibrate at the sound; the meaning unknown to the present generation. Under this different climate, new habits, new wants have been generated, national remembrances have been obliterated; all is new, all is changed.

Heretofore the young American, accustomed to hear his country contemned and despised, had no incentive to action. He had been told that in America all was degeneracy, all was savage, barbarous ignorance; and grave philosophers and naturalists have written books to prove the fact. Notwithstanding, he was prohibited from going to the mother country to enlighten his mind by an education, and by their inexorable laws forbidden to go even from one province to another. Thus, like a vegetable fastened to the soil, was he doomed to live, to die, and disappear forever, not even leaving a trace of his ever having existed.

Unable to govern himself, all officers of Government, of every rank and condition, have been sent him from Europe, to administer justice to him in his peaceable repose; but, sir, at the very sight of those officers they turned pale, and trembled at the sound of Spanish justice.

Thus have they lingered on, a listless life of acquiescence and patient resignation, for three hundred years, until this bright beam of liberty broke through the dark cloud of royalty which had nearly overshadowed them forever; but which, I trust, will light them to peace and to happiness as it has to independence.

If there are any doubts about their independence, from the circumstance of a part of Chili being still occupied by the royal forces, and a force of native Americans under Artigas opposed to the Republic, as stated by the gentleman from Georgia, let those doubts be dissipated when it is remembered, that, late in our own Revolutionary war, when the chances in the minds of many good men nearly poised between independence and subjugation, the celebrated battle of King's Mountain was fought between Whigs and Tories—a battle which has crowned the names of Campbell and of Shelby with immortal glory—a battle which measurably decided the fate of this Republic—nor let us longer doubt, when we reflect, that, by nature, every man in America is a General for enterprises like these. American wiles and stratagems, quick advance, attack, and fight, assure success; the slow and expensive formalities of European warfare, defeat.

These unfortunate people, sunk in despotism, have borne the contumely of all nations for their Spanish gravity, jealousy, and suspicion; but had even this been examined with indulgent kindness, it would have been found to be the mark which distinguished the slave of every country. This national gloom stamps itself upon the face of every Spaniard as soon as he is capable, from his own reflections, to distinguish that the tyranny of his Government, haunted continually by the phantoms of the imagination, has environed him with racks, and tortures, and the inquisition, where a living death of suffering awaits more terrible than all. He dare not speak—he knows not but that every one who hears him is a spy upon his conduct—silence is his only retreat—his liberty, his property, at the disposal of any clandestine informer—his life, his reputation, his honor, at the disposal of an implacable priest, who knows no mercy or forgiveness. Well might they exclaim, with a rapturous fervor, Oh! for a revolution—were celestial happiness compared with this!

If, in the commencement of this conflict, many bloody and revengeful acts have been committed, the noble spirits who direct the revolution cannot be implicated, or their cause condemned, nor ought it in justice to be used as an argument against them. The horrors of our own Revolution afford us proof of this, where the father and the son have been armed against each other—where cold-blooded murders have been perpetrated, butcheries and indiscriminate massacres of men, women, and children, because they were Whigs, or because they were Tories. These things, it is true, happened only in certain sections of the country, but they did take place; we have heard but little of them; the English historians seem disposed to cast a veil over them, and the American at this time is not disposed to tear it aside; then, in such a state of things, can we wonder if, in the fury of contending armies, these generous patriots should have left unpunished crimes which, in other times, their gentler natures would have wept at with tears of the bitterest sorrow? These things should not be attributed to them, but to their true source. Attribute them to that frenzied Power which sees nothing but the bloody dagger before it, and drives the most unresisting temper to madness and despair. The South Americans are now free, and long may the blessings of a republic attend them; for I am happy in being one of those who believe the liberties of a republic can be enjoyed by a Spaniard, or by anybody; the enjoyment of freedom is not peculiar to any nation; all will admit that the Greeks once had it; the Romans, the Dutch, and many others, as dissimilar in their national characters as the English and the French. Consult the annals of the world, and I believe it will be found, that, wherever men are capable of making an effort to obtain their freedom, they are capable of enjoying it. Then why not have the benevolence to allow these brave patriots at least a capacity for freedom, since they have given so strong a proof of it as to establish their Government through revolution, and maintain it in war?

If, Mr. Chairman, the law of nations is to be regarded by a just people; if the political whirlwinds which, for some time back, so desolated the civilized world, has left them anything but a wreck, or the hopeless resort of the weak and the impotent, I would say, that, whenever a contest became doubtful between contending Powers, without any regard whatever to the manner, cause, or origin of that contest, the world at large has a right to consider them equal, and even decide between them, if necessary, and is bound to extend to the one all the other had a right to expect. The case of James II, King of England, is a clear illustration of this position, and is acknowledged by all the writers on the law of nations as correct; and if a case more strong were necessary, as being a parallel in all respects to the present, I would cite that of the revolt of the Low Countries against Philip II, King of Spain, of "exterminating" memory, already spoken of by others, but with different impressions. Their independence, they declared, was acknowledged by Elizabeth, Queen of England, the wisdom, moderation, and justice, of whose government, is celebrated and acknowledged by all, even at this distant day, and places her among the most illustrious monarchs of the world. Philip remonstrated; her answer was—the law of nations gave her the right, and her interest prompted her to acknowledge their independence. Philip was content; nor did he even require his Ambassador to leave London. And is not England now precisely situated as she was then—the same necessity, nay, stronger inducements of interest? And will the present monarch, instructed by history, be less wise?

An honorable gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) has told us that the trade of the United States would receive no benefit from that country. He has told us that the article of wheat has been brought from Chili round to Brazil, or the West Indies, and sold at a lower rate than it could be taken from the United States. I would ask what the price of wheat has to do with the acknowledgment of the independence of those Republics? The inquiry has, too, been made with an air of triumph, what the United States would gain by an acknowledgment of this kind? I will not retort the question by asking what we could possibly lose by the acknowledgment; but I would ask, if it is a thing they, by the law of nations, have a right to give, without doing injustice to Spain, or any Power whatever, why not grant the request?

But, sir, I contend that the United States would gain, and gain essentially, too. Certainly nothing could be more desirable to this nation, so full of enterprise, than a free and direct trade to these countries, the most luxuriant and extensive in the world; so rich in everything we want, and containing such inexhaustible abundance of the precious metals, and needing many things we have to spare. There is the strongest probability that our exports, instead of sixty or seventy millions, would be increased very many millions, and would be much benefited, were it only from the advantages of our contiguous situation. Nor can I perceive the force of the remarks of the honorable member from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWMEYER,) luminous as he is on all subjects, when he tells us that injury will result to us, as our trade to that country, when compared with the trade of Great Britain to the same place, is, according to the little book from Philadelphia, in the ratio of one hundred thousand to seven millions. Surely, if we cannot receive all or most of the benefit, it cannot be a reason why we should not receive some benefit.

But the grand object and advantage would be in systematizing a policy for America; that we might be disenthralled—that we might not feel the effects of that political plexus which has so entangled the nations of Europe, by producing those intimate connexions and combinations by which the movements and operations of one Power are so felt by all, as to influence their councils, and produce corresponding motions. When now we negotiate, it is in Europe; when we are inconvenienced here, we send off an Ambassador there; they are governed by the principles and policy of continental Europe, and not by anything here. Do difficulties arise in Canada, they are adjusted in London. Do the same difficulties arise in Mexico, the province of Texas, or in Florida, it is settled in Madrid. Thus are we compelled to negotiate all our affairs upon the basis of European policy, because even the best interests of the colonists must give way to the policy of the mother country.

But when the independence of the South Americans shall be acknowledged, and they take their stand among the great nations of the earth, there will then be an American policy, and an European policy, which may, in negotiation upon just and honorable principles, be fairly opposed to each other. Nor does it militate against this position, whether, in the end, these governments shall be imperial or royal, instead of republican, which they now are. The great interests of America will be the same; and if, unhappily, difficulties should arise exclusively on this side the ocean, there will be no European convenience to consult, delay, or obstruct their adjustment in terms of complete reciprocity.

To acknowledge now the independence of South America, while the United States is writhing under a thousand wounds, each a sufficient cause of war, is the strongest proof of this nation's aversion to that state of things; and Spain cannot otherwise than receive it as a new proof, on the part of the United States, of their love of peace, and friendly dispositions towards His Catholic Majesty, when they will do justice to others promptly, and seek it for themselves, through years of patient negotiation.

I will not now revive the long train of injuries and injustice of Spain, inflicted upon us even from the Treaty of November, 1782, with Great Britain. I will not recall to the recollection of this House, that, a very few days ago, we were debating on this floor, with much earnest solicitude, the Georgia claims; I will not remind them that it was expenditures Georgia was compelled to make to secure her inhabitants from the tomahawk of the ruthless savages, invading her territory, and delighting in blood; I will not remind them that they were instigated to this by the infamous conduct of the still more infamous Baron de Carondelet, the then Spanish Governor at New Orleans; I will not inform them that she seized upon the territory of Georgia as high up as the thirty-second degree of latitude, and built forts on the Mississippi above that latitude, at the Walnut Hills. I will not remind the House that Georgia was a part of the United States, as acknowledged by Great Britain and Spain, an ally, or, at all events, as it regarded Spain, we stood, quo ad hoc, as Great Britain had done, and the Treaty of Peace compelled each of these Powers to surrender to each other all the territory taken during the war, except such as was specifically named in their treaty. I will not revive the remembrance of the many imperious, haughty, and insolent communications made to our Government previous to the Treaty of 1795. No, I will not mention these things; let them pass in silence, or as "a tale of the times of old;" but this I will say, and had I the power, the undulation should reach the shores of Spain, and echo on the Throne; that the deposite at New Orleans was taken from us without assigning us another place as such, in violation of the existing treaty. That the firing into the Firebrand, a national ship, was a violation of existing treaties. That the incarceration of Richard W. Meade, contrary to the laws of Spain, was a violation of existing treaties. That the confinement of Farro in the mines of Mexico for near nineteen years, was a violation of the existing treaty. That the confinement of Baird and McKnight, since the year 1811 or 1812, contrary to the laws of Spain, was a violation of existing treaties. That the capture of Choteau and Demun, far within the limits of the United States, and their subsequent confinement in the prisons of Santa Fe, was a violation of the existing treaty. That her permitting the British to land in her territory in Florida, during the late war, to arrange and plan invasions of the United States, was a violation of the existing treaty. That her permitting, at this very instant, the Indians, within her territory, to make war upon us, is a violation of existing treaties. That the letters of the Spanish Minister, written from this city, during the late war; so Spanish officers in South America, by which information was given to the enemy in the West Indies, was a violation of all law, treaties, and the usages of civilized nations, and would have hanged the most distinguished citizen of this Republic for a traitor. And I sternly demand, if the President of the United States has not been insulted by every Minister of Spain who has ever been near this Government? Has not Yrujo and De Onis insulted him, even while Congress was ready to hurl the bolt of war? These are the acts of Spain, accumulating with the returning year, and keenly felt by us, but only uttered in stifled groans of sorrow—some of them for twenty-six years. Sir, if the world wants a model of moderation and forbearance, the diplomatic history of the United States affords them ample and instructive lessons.

Mr. Chairman, I will not consume any more of the time of the House, and will conclude with this single remark, that, if Spain has been mistaken in her policy towards her colonies; if her system of tyranny and oppression, practised for so many ages, has at length driven them to acts of violence and of blood, she has but done that moral justice to herself which the world, in general, has long thought to be her due; for, surely, it is the vengeance of offended Heaven which has been awakened to punish this guilty empire; and, by this revolution, she must be torn from her foundation to expiate the horrible sacrilege she has committed, in defiling the temples of that God whom they pretend to adore, in calling upon his name, at the holy altars, with perjured oaths, to witness their treachery and deceit, when they were about to shed such oceans of innocent human blood, and with mockery, to sanctify the deed.

The millions, millions of innocent, unoffending, unresisting, victims, butchered by order of that Court, to satiate their cursed thirst for gold, now cry to Heaven for vengeance, with the tongues of accusing angels.

But, sir, I am sick; my heart bleeds at the remembrance of that bloody page of Spanish history. Nor is there a man, whose bosom has ever felt one generous emotion, that does not feel his blood run back with icy horror to the heart, when he recollects the poor Indian, whose whole soul was a day of sunshine—ingenuous, noble, brave, disinterested—free as the winds which extend from earth to heaven, he slept upon the moss of the mountain, and leaned his head against a tree, and said: "This is my house—there is none to take it from me"—content to kill the wild animals for food, and pluck the simple fruit with which great nature in her sportive fancy had blessed this country; nor knew he of misery or distress, until the Spaniard came. Then, oh! bitter, sad reverse! Butchered in cold blood; roasted and burnt for crimes he never heard of, or could not understand; hunted down like the wild deer of the forest; pursued by that foul, phrensed, noisome thirst for dominion, into the swamps of the Orinoco, or tracked and torn by dogs and blood-hounds from his mournful hiding places, in the almost inaccessible fastnesses of the mountains, whilst his bed, a rock in the cavern, streamed with tears of anguish and despair.

But the day of retributive revenge has come; cursed by those airy phantoms which flit before their guilty apprehensions, they have awakened their slumbering vengeance to wreak it upon the heads of their own descendants, because they have multiplied in the land of their original desolation; pursued and chafed by the heavy hand of a despot, spurned as degenerate men, despised as inferiors, their petitions scorned and chastised as the offspring of folly and discontent, their remonstrances treated as presumptuous insolence, almost crushed beneath a load of accumulating wrongs, they nobly resolved to be free, and are free, because they willed it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, observed, that the subject was intimately connected with the cause of civil and religious liberty. The cause in which the Spanish patriots were engaged, was identified with the freedom and happiness of twenty millions of people, and their posterity to the latest ages. The proposition is confined to a legislative acknowledgment of the independence of the Buenos Ayrean Republic, embracing the twenty provinces of Rio de la Plata, and tends to show, that a recognition of that independence, by the President of the United States, would meet the wishes and support of the nation. Such a legislative confession of the public sentiment, on a subject so important and momentous, in the estimation of many, he conceived was due to the Executive authority. It would be taking to ourselves a just portion of the responsibility of such a measure, and tend to strengthen the arm of Administration. It is not a little remarkable, that the opposers of this measure should be driven to the necessity of ascribing to its advocates a hostility to the Administration. But this objection has no greater weight than the others which have been urged against it, and which are made to this kind of legislative expression in any abstract form, and because it has assumed a form from which there may be some practical result. The main question, in debate, seems to be the expediency of recognising the independence of the Provinces of La Plata; this is the essence of the proposition submitted. The fact of independence has been doubted by some, and positively denied by others; but this fact is well established, and is as certain as any common event recorded in history; and we have sufficient proof that this independence has been maintained with a firmness and gallantry worthy of the cause. But an objection has been urged, that we have not been furnished with the precise territorial limits claiming to be independent. In such a struggle, and in such a vast extent of country, it would be surprising indeed if the precise boundary of the provinces had been furnished, and their limits accurately defined. But it is a matter of no consequence, and has no important or essential bearing upon the subject, because it does not, in the most remote degree, lessen the high claims of this suffering and meritorious people upon us, to recognise their independence. It must be known to these gentlemen, that our limits were as unsettled and undefined during the American Revolution; and, in fact, to this very hour, a controversy exists with both England and Spain, as to our true boundary line. But did this lessen our claim to independence during the Revolution? It was well known to all the world, that the Thirteen Colonies had declared themselves independent, claimed to be independent, and had maintained their independence as a sovereign State, in opposition to the power of England. It is equally well known, that the provinces of the River la Plata have declared themselves independent, solemnly proclaimed the fact to the world, and have maintained this independence in a manner which must claim the respect and admiration of nations. A distinct and separate government has been instituted; a legislative, an executive, and a judicial department has been organized, with the power to raise armies, build navies, impose taxes to defray the expenses of the government, without aid from Spain, whose authority has been destroyed. But it has been urged, from the last and most authentic intelligence, that a part of these independent provinces was occupied by the troops of the enemy; but this can have no weight. It will be recollected, that, after the severe and bloody battle of Brandywine, the British troops marched and took possession of Philadelphia, and held it; was it ever contended that this lessened our claims to independence? When we suffered a most disastrous defeat upon Long Island, the British forces took possession of New York and held it; but did this lessen our claims to independence? Previous to the capture of Cornwallis, Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, and Virginia, were in the military occupation of the British; did this lessen our claims to independence, or lessen the obligations of other persons to acknowledge it? No gentleman will surely answer in the affirmative. But, waiving these objections, the recognition of the independence of the Republic of La Plata has been pronounced a doubtful policy. Does recognition alone, without taking part in the war, violate the obligations of neutrality? Is it repugnant to the usages or the law of nations? Is it in opposition to the laws of nature, of reason, or of God? In short, is it inconsistent with the most friendly relations? The right of recognition has been admitted by all, not a doubtful right, but positive and undeniable; and the exercise of this right can be no just cause of complaint against us by Spain, or by any other nation, unless our independence is also denied. But the possibility of war with Spain, and, consequently, with some other European Power, seems to constitute the principal objection, with some, to this proposition. I say, the possibility of war, for no one has seriously contended that a simple recognition is either a just cause of war, or that it will produce a war; history does not furnish an instance, and bare assertion must not be received; but if it should be made a pretext of complaint against us, it is urged, that it is possible it may produce war, but it is certainly not very probable. The recognition of the independence of those provinces, sir, is not only a right, but, in my opinion, it is, on this occasion, a sacred and solemn duty we owe to ourselves and to the great and interesting cause of freedom. What will be the effect of this recognition? Does it give the patriots any advantage over Old Spain, or any other sovereign State? No, sir, it only places them on an equality, by giving them rank among the independent nations of the earth; it only consummates that course of neutrality, and that system of equal justice, which we have so solemnly declared to the world to be our great object. The flag of the patriots is admitted into our ports and harbors; we have opened a trade with them; we have extended to them, by law, certain rights and immunities; and have endeavored to place them upon an equality with Old Spain, by our commercial regulations; and if any benefit can result to the Buenos Ayrean Republic, by receiving a minister or commercial agent, I cannot see the force of the objection to this measure. The conduct of Spain has not been such as to give any great force to a weak objection; she cannot expect from us acts of kindness, nor forbearance in the exercise of a right, or, rather, in the discharge of an obligation. Peace, it is conceded, is the policy of the United States, if consistent with the enjoyment of liberty. We cannot, I admit, without great indiscretion, interfere in the quarrels of other nations, or depart from a system of neutrality, even in the great cause of South American liberty. But the friends of liberty and of man cannot divest themselves of feeling, or look with indifference and apathy upon a contest, in which they behold a country, rivalling in beauty and fertility the rich and romantic vale of Cashmere, laid waste by the ravages of war, and the defenders of freedom treated as rebels and traitors. There is nothing, most certainly, in this great struggle that should prevent us from completing our system of equal justice to both parties, since we have endeavored to effect that object by the commercial regulations of the country. And why do we hesitate; why quake and tremble at the idea of a recognition so important? Why so many imaginary dangers at the exercise of an undoubted right? The crowned heads of Europe may take offence at it, but what would be the basis of this dislike? Mere opposition to the triumph of republican principles. It was this triumph of liberty and self-government that brought upon republican France the coalition of monarchical Europe. But the nature of this opposition is the very strongest reason why the United States should recognise the independence of the Republic of La Plata. It is called a republic, and if I did not believe that the principles of liberty would be cherished, and a free and independent government established, the proposition would not meet my sanction. Exercising a discretion, I would not choose to recognise kingly power as long as war was continued by the parties. The great cause of political emancipation is the stimulating principle with me, for the exercise of this right of recognition. The labors of the illustrious navigator who discovered the Western World, shall not be in vain. North America has become an asylum—a place of refuge—from the tyranny and usurpation of Kings. A ray of liberty has penetrated the gloom which enveloped the South; and, although the timid may abandon the cause of freedom, and the bold and daring may fall an early sacrifice upon her altar, the principles of religious toleration and political emancipation must march on steadily (though slow) till the will of Him who controls the destinies of the world shall have been executed. If crowned heads refuse to recognise the independence of Spanish America, it is surely no reason why the United States should do so. To what quarter of the earth shall they send a Minister for this purpose. If they meet with no kindness here, when will they receive the cheering light from the countenance of a kindred Government? If we dare not go as far as the laws of nations will warrant, who shall give them the plaudit of Well done? History teems with the events of Republics, splendid, powerful, and happy. They exist no more. Despotism has swept them from the earth, and has only left their names on the records of nations; and we (the people of the United States) stand alone in this vast world of tyranny and oppression—no kindred Republic to sympathize with or to depend on in the hour of danger and dismay—and alone defying the principles and power of legitimacy. No Grecian Republic; no Roman Commonwealth; no States General of Holland; no National Assembly of France—no, not even the little Republic of San Marino—now exists, to acknowledge the independence of the La Plata Republic.

If I could believe it was the will of Heaven that I should vote against the proposition, I would bow with reverence to that will; if I believed that duty to my country opposed my course, I would cheerfully obey the impulse of that duty; if I believed that I was about to trample upon the laws and rights of nations, I would also pause; but the opposition of European monarchs will have no influence upon my mind, except to produce a more positive resolution to discharge what I conceive to be a most sacred obligation. Those monarchs may look with anxiety upon the part we may take—they may look at it, if they will, with an awful squinting—but no alarms are conveyed to my bosom. Resistance to oppression constitutes no crime, in my mind; nor shall I be ashamed to rejoice in the triumph of liberty, and the principles of self-government, until I am led to believe that the monarchs of the earth are superior to the Monarch of Heaven. May the God of the Universe, in his mercy, sustain this struggling and suffering people, in the cause of political and religious liberty! I will not fear the result; the spirit of liberty has diffused itself too widely, and its enthusiasm too deeply, to be controlled by the efforts of despotism, or the apathy of kindred Republics. Freedom has cast her rays upon the darkness of human error, and irradiated the gloom which has enshrouded the human mind. Truth has, indeed, restored the light of nature. The conduct of Spain has been made a part of this discussion. The time is fast approaching when we shall be called upon to examine this conduct more minutely, and to judge of the measures that may grow out of it. If Spain does not relax in her pretensions, and manifest a disposition to act with more justice and liberality, there can be but one opinion as to the prospect of an amicable adjustment—a fact of which we must be convinced, from the information communicated to us by the Executive that the negotiation is at an end, and that the President has determined to occupy the Floridas, in order to guaranty the peace and safety of our citizens from the wild incursions and brutal murders of the savages. This is policy—this is wisdom—and the nation will support the measure. But the conduct of Spain is not necessarily involved in this question of recognition; nor the occupation of the Floridas for indemnity—a measure suggested by the chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations. Whenever that measure shall be presented for consideration, then, and not till then, shall I conceive it my duty to enter into a detail of Spanish injuries and aggressions: the closing, upon the commerce of the Western country, the port of New Orleans, in violation of treaty, without assigning any other place of deposit; not till then, need we estimate the spoiliations upon our commerce; the violation of the treaty of 1795, in not keeping in order and subjection, within her territories, the Seminole savages; her conduct in the late war, in permitting the British and the Indians to use the Floridas as a place of refuge—a rallying point for our enemies. Nor will it be a matter of any consequence whether this state of things did arise from co-operation on the part of Spain, or an inability to maintain her local authorities and her treaty, as well as neutral obligations, to the United States. Whenever it shall be brought to this point—that we must submit to what is past, and a prospect of what is to come, or occupy the Floridas—my mind has never hesitated a moment upon the course my duty to my country would lead me to pursue, if negotiation fails. I would not submit to such conduct from any nation on earth.

But this has no influence on my mind. If the conduct of Spain had been towards us the most amicable and friendly; if she had acted not only with the strictest justice, but, like Cæsar's wife, even without suspicion, and if her purity had been as spotless as the snow which falls from heaven, it is still the duty of this Government to recognise the independence of the Republics of La Plata, Venezuela, New Grenada, Chili, Mexico, and the rest, as soon as they shall declare themselves free and independent, and manifest a capacity and a determination to maintain the rank and relations of a foreign and independent State. But I cannot for a moment hesitate to believe that the Administration feels this disposition as strongly, as cogently, as those who support it. The proper point of time can be with them the only cause of hesitation; the desire must be the same with every branch of the Government as with the people. Everything, sir, evinces the claim of South America to independence; its distance from Europe—the nature and interest of its soil and limits—the character of its people—all conspire to show that it never was designed by Heaven, that it should be subject to the domination of European rulers; but, like our beloved country, it should one day become the great sanctuary of liberty, and the asylum of persecution. To oppose this destiny, would not only be useless, but impious and impolitic. The Government of the United States has been distinguished for its justice, moderation, and pacific policy. We should maintain that character; we should not depart from that course of conduct; let us be cautious, but decisive; not rash or timid, but bold and prudent; let us do nothing that would infringe the rights of others, but feel no alarm at the consequences of doing what it is our duty to perform. We can read the condition of this people by turning the mind back to the scenes of the American Revolution.

But it has been asserted that the South Americans have not been fighting for liberty and self-government. It has been asserted that they were not entitled to our sympathy; that the independence of the Spanish provinces was a matter of no consequence to the United States, politically or commercially; and that self-government, and the establishment of liberty, might, to be sure, be of some consequence morally, but could not be so, politically or commercially. How surprising! How wonderful! Let us for a moment consider this point. A connexion with South America is, in an eminent degree, important, commercially, politically, and morally. From the nature of our Government and institutions, we are considered by the people of South America their natural friends and allies, and from this necessarily expect from us that aid and assistance which a nation, contending for the same political principles, and having an intimate geographical connexion, has a right to expect. Should we coldly refuse the favor they solicit, the result will be, that they will lose that sympathy they now feel, and transfer their present attachment and respect to some other Power, less phlegmatic and indifferent to their own interest. And what would be the loss, in a pecuniary point of view? A market calculated to consume the surplus of our agricultural products and manufactures, and the signal advantages that would result in the exchange of our commodities for the precious metals alone. We should indeed have, as we now have, the uncertain and limited markets which the Canadas and the West Indies afford, under the illiberal systems of colonial regulations. The surplus produce of two States alone would supply them, while the whole of that rich and beautiful country, whose independence its citizens wish us to recognise, would be lost to us perhaps forever. But this is not all. From the very nature of things, we should become her carriers as long as the two nations exist. Mexico, for instance, is situated like China, and not likely to become a nation of mariners, but must receive the nations of the earth into her ports, and give her bullion in exchange for the productions of other countries. Our vessels would fill every port, and from our vicinity enable us to carry off nine-tenths of her commerce. And yet this is to us of no kind of importance, but a real evil! Have those who advocate this doctrine paid proper attention to the geography of these countries they so vehemently depreciate? Where shall we find a more lovely, a more abundant region? Where shall we look for a spot on earth where nature has lavished more wealth, and greater beauties? Where shall we find so happily realized the visions of poetry, and the descriptive painting of imagination? A country of immense extent, and a soil of endless variety and fertility, teeming with the most precious metals, and beautified with the most splendid, elegant, and useful botanical productions. A country, in the emphatic language of scripture, flowing with milk and honey, and where nature seems to repose from her toil, and stamp on her productions the perfection of beauty. The vast waters of La Plata, the variety of its soil, the diversity of its climate, the productions of the temperate and the torrid zones—the mines of Potosi, unrivalled in ancient or modern times—the lofty summits of the Andes, covered with never-melting snows—nor the delightful vales of the Parana and the Uruguay—nor the prospect of freedom to millions of human beings, can swell with delight the bosoms of some men. And a connexion with this highly gifted land, in the opinion of some, is a real disadvantage, in a commercial and political point of view. But the patriots of South America have been denied the merit of fighting for liberty; this charge is neither novel nor well founded. I need only refer to the history of our own country; the same charge was made against our fathers, who were engaged in the glorious struggle which has eventuated in the blessings we enjoy. What stronger proof do we require of the purity of the motives by which the South Americans are influenced in their present struggle, than that they have submitted for so many years to the privations and dangers, and miseries of war? What but a deep-rooted love of liberty, could produce this fortitude, or beget this perseverance? And are we to be told that they do not merit our sympathy, while contending and struggling through miseries, and want, and dangers, for the possession of those rights which we have obtained, and to which the human family are entitled by nature? Merciful Heaven! have we indeed come to this? Are we reduced so low in the scale of humanity? I shudder to think of the consequences of such doctrines. A vista, dark and dreary, and dismal, opens before me. I see apathy shedding her alarming influence over the hearts of my countrymen, and the genius of despotism winding her mazy folds around the offspring of freedom. Such indifference does not become the American people in a cause like this. In their zeal to oppose this measure, gentlemen have indeed gone so far as to endeavor to prove that the freedom and independence of the Spanish provinces would not only be of no political and commercial consequence, but singularly unfortunate to the United States—that our happiness, freedom, and prosperity, would decline in consequence of such an event; and yet, at the commencement of this discussion, every one expressed the most ardent desire for the patriot cause.

It is possible that necessity has driven members of this House to such a course of reasoning to oppose the proposition before us, but it shows the feebleness of error. Sir, to deny that the struggle in South America has been a struggle for liberty and independence, is to close our eyes against the facts, and the history of that struggle; and to deny that any commercial political advantage would flow from the establishment of independence in South America, is to deny self-evident propositions; we may as well deny the existence of matter, or any other physical agent. It has been boldly asserted, that there is no parallel between the American Revolution and the struggle in Spanish America. I know not through what medium gentlemen may view things; but I can see a most striking analogy in the two cases. We had a heavy burden of grievous impositions to bear—so had they, perhaps tenfold greater; we had our day of loyal attachments, humble petitions, and mild remonstrance—so had they; we were spurned and driven from the royal favor—so were they; in the progress of the Revolution we had had our day of resistance, and appealed to arms—so had they; we had our day of proscription, when the penalties of rebellion and treason were fulminated against our fathers—so had they; rising with the crisis, we had our day of independence, and proclaimed it to the world—so had they; we had our committees, our conventions, and our Congress—so had they their junta municipalities, and Congress; we had our Warrens and our Montgomeries—so have they; we had, too, our Arnolds—and so have they; and as we were triumphant, if the patriots of South America shall be worthy of the cause, and true to themselves, the same kind Providence will uphold them, and make them triumphant also. When we compare the extent and resources of the Peninsula, or Old Spain, with the extent and resources of South America and New Mexico, this opinion will acquire additional strength and confirmation. But, although history furnishes many examples of successful revolutions against the heavy hand of despotism, yet we are called back to the frequent success of power, and reminded that the difficulties which arise from revolutions are of no ordinary character, and that to meet them requires the most heroic fortitude, and the most gallant conduct. I am aware, sir, that the system of oppression cannot easily be overthrown, and that the power of crowned heads will not be surrendered willingly; they will not surrender inexhaustible mines of wealth, the treasures arising from the toil and sweat of the laboring poor, without compulsion; the fairest portion of the globe, and twenty millions of subjects, the victims of their unhallowed pleasure and ambition; and the world must remain in the most anxious and awful suspense about the event of this struggle, and wait with eagerness to know how the revolution, in many of the Spanish provinces, may terminate. The price of liberty is blood. The mind rejoices in hope, when it is recollected how long these patriots have sustained the glorious contest, and defied the bloody conflict. This gives the strongest evidence of the merit of the persecuted combatants, and the justice of their cause. The Israelites were doomed to forty years sojournment in the wilderness, and were in sight of the land of promise, because they proved unworthy of the blessings of Heaven; they were alarmed at the information of the spies of the army, who gave them a description of the giants who inhabited the land of Canaan; and notwithstanding the cause—the banners under which they fought—they were alarmed at the sons of Anak. For this they were doomed to spend the remainder of their days in the wilderness, until a new race of warriors should be raised up worthy of the holy cause in which they were engaged. The same may be the design of Heaven in relation to the South Americans, in permitting this sore trial of cruelty, and suffering, and murder. This severe probation may produce a race of heroes worthy of the cause of independence. The rising youth may catch and diffuse the holy fire of liberty, and rush on to battle and to certain victory.

Something has been said of the character of the war which has been waged in South America. And as the patriots have been compelled to retaliate, upon some occasions, the murders and cruelties of the mother country, they have been considered unlike the patriots of our Revolution, who abstained from the system of retaliation. It is not the fact that we gave up this right, or that we omitted to exercise it whenever it was necessary and proper. When it could be omitted it was omitted, and not otherwise. When policy could, with safety, yield to mercy, our fathers were governed by the principles of humanity. At a time when the patriots of our Revolution were considered and denounced as traitors and rebels, by royal proclamation, nothing but the most solemn declaration on the part of Congress and General WASHINGTON, at the head of our armies, that retaliation should be most rigidly pursued, prevented the assassination of our officers and soldiers when prisoners of war. This alone saved many of them; this system of retaliation, or the fear of it, induced Great Britain to give up the idea of rebellion and treason, and stayed the hand of the executioner. And if the fathers of our country had permitted our gallant officers and soldiers to have been hung, shot, and murdered, without retaliation, they never could have succeeded in the cause in which they were engaged, nor have secured the confidence of the people. Indeed the people would have had ample cause to have abandoned a Government feeble, inefficient, and withholding protection where it was due. No such foul charge can be made against those who conducted our Revolution. In the late war with Great Britain, when this same system of cruelty was commenced, did our Chief Magistrate silently and tamely look on? When the gallant Irishman was taken in arms fighting for his adopted country, and thrown into prison as a traitor to his sovereign, what stayed the sentence of condemnation, or the hand of the executioner, but the firmness and decision of Mr. Madison—a name I can never utter without respect, veneration, and affection. He took hold on the British soldier and put him in prison; and England had, to her shame, to retrace her steps, and to acknowledge the harshness and infamy of her course. The lex talionis should be preserved—blood should pay the price of blood. And, in this case, British officers and soldiers would have been the victims of British policy. There is nothing to condemn in the system of retaliation. If pursued by the patriots, it was a solemn discharge of a most solemn duty. The system of murder did not begin with them. To this day the armies of Old Spain consider and treat them as traitors; and if the patriots do not retaliate, whenever it may be necessary, they deserve to fall the victims of such folly and imbecility. In one point it is hoped, and it is known, that they have not imitated the enemy. The fact has been mentioned, and it is not denied, that the troops of Old Spain had been employed in poisoning the water, and the food of the patriots, to destroy them. In this system of destruction they have not been imitated. No, sir, Satan himself would be ashamed to claim kindred with a foe so infamous. When he rebelled, and was without hope, he exclaimed, farewell hope, and, with hope, farewell fear. Though fallen from his high estate, and in despair, he was content with a declaration of open war, and open acts of hostility. The arbitrary power of provincial officers; the cruelty of the Captain General of Old Spain; the vigilance of the spies of the inquisition; the unhappy condition of the natives, have not been, when combined, sufficiently powerful to stop the march, and arrest the progress of correct revolutionary principles.

The patriots have acted in a manner worthy of themselves, in taking advantage of the first favorable opportunity, the invasion of Spain by Napoleon Bonaparte, and the subversion of the Spanish and kingly authority in that country, to declare themselves independent, and throw off the yoke of bondage which bowed them to the earth. The most unlimited and arbitrary exercise of power has been practised by the Spanish Viceroy; nocturnal arrests have been made by corrupt judges, the willing instruments of corrupt power; banishment without trial; transportation to Old Spain, without assigning the causes; offices confined to European Spaniards; manufactures prohibited; the culture of other commodities limited; the establishment of the inquisition, and a perfect system of religious intolerance; liberty of speech and the press unknown; no trial by jury; property insecure, and at the will of judges; the study of political economy prohibited; and other acts of oppression, which would fill a volume, have been the acts which they have groaned under. I cannot feel indifferent in such a cause; and while I am willing to vote in favor of recognition, as proposed, I am unwilling to step beyond the bounds of discretion, or depart from our neutral obligations.

In the day of our adversity, how anxious were we to be recognised by foreign Powers, and to claim their assistance? But here we are asked only to recognise the independence of the South American provinces, already free and sovereign, without requiring our aid, which cannot, consistently with the law of nations, give cause of complaint to any Power on earth. When clouds and darkness hung upon our political horizon, how did the bosom of the patriot swell with rapture and consolation when European nations began to acknowledge our independence! We have succeeded; we arose from the thralldom which benumbed our faculties with renovated vigor and redoubled energy; nations gazed with astonishment at the novelty of the spectacle and the magnitude of the enterprise. Despotism shrunk from our hemisphere as from contagion and death, and the world regarded us as a prodigy. South America has pursued our track and imitated our glorious example. The gloom of superstition and oppression has vanished, and their path has been irradiated by the beams of liberty. They have waded through blood and submitted to misery to obtain a participation in the blessings we enjoy. They say to us, We are your brethren; you are the only Government on earth that ought to feel an interest in our destiny; the monarchs of Europe have set their faces against us; their policy, their interest, will not suffer them to give us countenance; we are fighting the battles of freedom; the cause is one which must, which ought to be dear to you; we stand alone, unaided and friendless; we wish you to recognise that independence which we have achieved. If you will not extend the hand of fraternal love, to whom can we look, to whom dare we apply? Should we be crushed by the hand of power, you stand alone against the despotism of Europe and the world. Could you hope to resist such a combination? And if you fall, where is freedom to find a shelter, and man an asylum?

It is the will of Heaven that South America should be free; let all opposition cease; let the nations of the earth search after His will and obey His commands; His power cannot be controlled; His providence cannot be resisted; He governs the universe; then let us do these people, let us do ourselves, justice. This is not a moment for hesitation. To pause will perhaps be serious. The acknowledgment of their independence cannot injure the cause of freedom, or give just grounds of offence to nations; but it will inspire confidence—give them a stand and an attitude that Europe will respect, and reanimate the drooping spirits of the Patriots. We shall preserve the character we have acquired; our actions will correspond with our professions; and the world and posterity will acknowledge that our career has been that of generosity and of greatness, and our conduct just and magnanimous.

Why should we hesitate? Can we fear the result, when we witness so universal a spirit of patriotism pervading all ranks and classes of society, and setting at defiance want, and wretchedness, and torture? Can we fear the result, when we remember that every event is under the direction of God's providence? His infinite wisdom, and His tender mercy will be manifested in the result. Then let us not hesitate; let us act worthy of ourselves, and evince to the world that we are not only free, but worthy of that freedom.

Mr. FORSYTH spoke briefly in explanation; when, on motion of Mr. SMYTH, of Virginia, the Committee rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, March 27.

Mr. RICH, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred two reports of the Commissioners of Claims, containing the reports of the facts in one hundred and fifty-eight cases of applications for payment for property destroyed by the enemy in Buffalo, and its vicinity, on the Niagara frontier, from the 19th December, 1813, and the 1st of January, 1814, both inclusive, made a report thereon, which was read; when, Mr. R. reported a bill for the relief of the sufferers on the Niagara frontier, which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, made a report of the petition of Kenzie and Forsyth, which was read; when, Mr. W. reported a bill for the relief of Kenzie and Forsyth, which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RHEA reported a bill for the relief of Cornelia Mason, which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BRECHER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported their agreement to the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act respecting the district courts of the United States, within the State of New York;" which were concurred in by the House.

Mr. BRECHER also reported the agreement of the said committee to the amendments proposed by the Senate, to the bill, entitled "An act to alter the time of holding the circuit court in the southern district of New York, and for other purposes." The amendment was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HERBERT from the committee appointed on the petition of John Darnall, by leave of the House, reported a bill for the relief of the said John Darnall, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. PINDALL, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of making provision, by law, touching the prosecution of petitions of right, and informations of intrusion, in the federal courts, in cases wherein the United States are concerned; and Messrs. PINDALL, SERGEANT, COBB, ADAMS, and TALLMADGE, were appointed the committee.

On motion of Mr. CLAIBORNE, Resolved, That the President's Message, and accompanying documents, upon the subject of the expenses incurred under the 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th articles of the Treaty of Ghent, be referred to a committee; and that they be instructed to inquire into the nature and causes of said expenses; also, into the principles upon which the Commissioners, under the 6th, and 7th articles of said treaty have heretofore proceeded in the execution thereof, and that said committee make a detailed report thereon, for which purpose they shall have power to send for such persons and papers as they may deem necessary.

Messrs. CLAIBORNE, BARBOUR, of Virginia, ROBERTSON, of Kentucky, MORTON, and WILLIAMS, of Connecticut, were appointed said committee.

Mr. McLANE, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act concerning the bounty or allowance to fishing vessels, in certain cases," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, submitted a joint resolution, directing the printing and distribution of the act for the relief of certain surviving officers of the Revolution, and the instructions issued relative thereto, from the Department of War, among the clerks of the several courts of record within the United States; which was twice read and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill supplementary to the act "to authorize the State of Tennessee, to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described, and to settle the claims to the vacant and unappropriated land within the same," passed the 18th day of April, 1816, was received from the Senate, and, having been twice read, the question was stated on its being ordered to a second reading—

Mr. EDWARDS rose, not, he said, for the purpose of opposing the bill, for that would be unavailing; nor had he any wish to commit it. It was well known that an unpleasant difference had long existed between the States of North Carolina and Tennessee in relation to the object of the bill, upon which both States had memorialized Congress. The Supreme Court of the United States had however lately pronounced an opinion in the case before it, by which the question in controversy was settled against the pretensions of North Carolina. As there is no other alternative, said he, since we ought to submit to the powers that be, he would content himself simply by saying that he did not concur in the opinion of the court, and by signifying his dissent to the bill, without troubling the House with his reasons for either.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and passed.

The bill from the Senate "regulating the staff of the Army;" the bill "regulating the fees of notaries in the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia;" the bill "to incorporate a Fire Insurance Company in the City of Washington;" and "the bill to make valid certain acts of the Justices of Peace in the District of Columbia," were severally twice read and referred to select committees.

BENEFIT OF DRAWBACK.

Mr. McLANE, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, made a report on the petition of Thomas Hutchinson, and partners; which was read, as follows:

The petitioners state that in the year 1815 they imported into New York a quantity of merchandise, which they were desirous of reshipping from the United States, and to obtain a drawback. Being ignorant themselves of the requisites necessary to obtain the benefit of drawback, they applied to the deputy naval officer, who undertook to have the proper entries made, and to superintend the whole business; that the deputy naval officer, however, failed to apprise them of the necessity of giving the bonds required by the act of Congress, and, being themselves ignorant of the law, they neglected to enter into any such bonds; that the goods were re-exported, and regularly landed at the foreign port to which the vessel cleared out. The bonds having never been given, however, the petitioners have been denied the benefit of drawback, and they pray Congress to allow it, as though the bonds had been regularly given.

The committee consider that it would be establishing a dangerous precedent to allow the plea of ignorance of the requisites of the law to dispense with their provisions. In this instance the bonds were the most essential part of the whole business, and indispensable to the safety of the revenue. If the petitioners applied to the deputy naval officer for advice, rather than to the regular officer of the district, the United States should not be liable for his omission or want of information. The committee, therefore, recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted.

The report was concurred in.

SPANISH AMERICAN PROVINCES.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the general appropriation bill—to which an amendment had been moved by Mr. CLAY to introduce an appropriation for the outfit of a Minister to Buenos Ayres—

Mr. A. SMYTH, of Virginia, said, that he was opposed to the proposition under consideration, and should contend, in the first place, that the measure proposed is an act of usurpation, an invasion of the Executive authority. Secondly, he would contend, that the conduct of the Executive branch of the Government, as respected Spain and her American provinces, has been perfectly impartial and honorable, and such as was required by the interest and honor of the United States; that, therefore, no interference on our part was necessary. And, thirdly, he would contend that the measure proposed was pregnant with evil, and may jeopardize the safety of the United States.

The Constitution, said Mr. S., grants to the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, power to appoint Ambassadors and public Ministers, and to make treaties. According to the usage of the Government, it is the President who receives all foreign Ministers, and determines what foreign Ministers shall or shall not be received. It is by the exercise of some one of these powers, in neither of which has this House any participation, that a foreign Power must be acknowledged. Then the acknowledgment of the independence of a new Power is an exercise of Executive authority; consequently, for Congress to direct the Executive how he shall exercise this power, is an act of usurpation.

To give such direction must be an act of usurpation, if it shall have any effect. Should the direction be given, by adopting the proposition under consideration, and have effect, then the President will send a Minister to Buenos Ayres, not according to his own opinion, but according to the opinion of Congress. Then the President will perform his proper Constitutional duties as Congress shall be pleased to direct. Will not this be changing the Constitution, by usurpation? It is for the Executive branch of the Government to decide to whom, and when, a public Minister shall be sent. Congress undertake to decide when and to whom a public Minister shall be sent; is not this usurpation?

You possess the power of impeachment, and, consequently, may discuss, and, by resolution, express, an opinion on any past act, either of the Executive or of the Judiciary; but you have no right to give a direction to either.

The President is responsible for the proper execution of his Constitutional powers; he may be punished for abusing them, or for neglect of his duty. This House is the proper body to prosecute him, if he shall fail to do his duty. We are not, in like manner, responsible and punishable. If we direct the President to do an act, however injurious to the nation it may prove, we cannot make him responsible. Is it proper thus to deprive the people of the security which they have reserved to themselves, in the President's Constitutional responsibility?

The President is re-eligible at the end of four years; it is, therefore, fair that he should be left free to execute his Constitutional powers; that the people may be enabled to judge the manner in which he has executed them. If you undertake to direct the President in the performance of his duties, you deprive him of the merit of those acts which the people might approve. Let it be supposed that the President intends to do the act which it is proposed that we shall direct him to do, and that the act is one which deserves, and will receive, the approbation of the people. If you shall direct him to do the act, his performance of it will be ascribed to your direction, and all the credit due to the act will be given to you, and withheld from the President. On the contrary, should the President disapprove of the proposed measure, resist the usurpation, and maintain his Constitutional rights, the consequence must be, that either the President or Congress must sink in the estimation of the people.

By adopting the proposition under consideration, you will pronounce to the world, that the President will not voluntarily do his duty; and that it has become necessary that you, by directing, should compel him. You certainly intend that your direction shall have effect, and it can have no effect, unless it compels the President to do an act which otherwise he would not have done. You do not intend merely to place Congress in collision with the President; to raise an opposition to him, in case he shall have firmness enough to maintain his Constitutional rights, and to act according to his own views of the interests of the United States.

The people have, by the Constitution, distributed distinct powers to the several departments of the Government: the Executive power they have confided to the President, either alone, or by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; they have adopted a particular mode of electing the President, intended to secure to the office of Chief Magistrate the greatest wisdom, knowledge, patriotism, and integrity. They have a right to the free and voluntary services of the citizen whom they have selected, as possessing those qualities, to fill the Presidential Chair; a right to all the advantages to be derived from his talents and his information. And at no time has the Executive department of this Government more deserved the public confidence than at present. At no moment since the formation of the Constitution, did the Cabinet possess, in so great a degree, the qualities which a Cabinet ought to possess, viz: talents, knowledge, political information, and harmony.

Yet at the very moment when the President has his agents in those countries, which claim to be admitted to the rank of nations, for the purpose of ascertaining their true situation, and to discover what order of things will probably be ultimately established, it is proposed that you shall prematurely interfere, and that, before the desirable information has been obtained in such a mode as may be relied on, you shall, on such information as the Speaker (Mr. CLAY) has gleaned from newspapers and pamphlets, direct the President to send a Minister to Buenos Ayres. Should your interference be at any time expedient, certainly this is the most improper time to interfere. The want of information on this subject has been fully shown by this discussion. No one will pretend that the members of this House generally are well informed concerning the actual and political state of the Spanish provinces, and the contradictory nature of the information given to the Committee, by those members who have taken pains to procure information, proves that we have none that is worthy of being relied on.

It is by the President only that the United States communicate, negotiate, and treat, with foreign nations. To them, as has been properly observed by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWMEYER,) we should present a single front. The measure proposed seems, in itself, of little importance; but it will be understood by the speeches of the honorable mover, and others, by whom it is supported. Thus understood, the proposition goes to degrade your President in the eyes of foreign nations. If Congress shall assume power to direct the President, this House becomes the efficient Executive. Who would be President on such conditions?

I proceed to show that the conduct of the Executive, as relates to Spain and the provinces, has been impartial, honorable, and such as comported with the true interest of the United States.

The honorable Speaker has been pleased to say, that the conduct of the Executive towards Spain and the provinces was calculated to irritate both parties, and conciliate neither. This brings to our recollection what he said on a former occasion—that the acts of the Executive had been all on one side, and bearing entirely against the colonists. This charge, which has never been answered, was made by a gentleman whose assertion will be respected as authority throughout Europe, as well as throughout this country, by those who do not examine for themselves.

If we examine those acts of the Executive which have any bearing on the contest between Spain and the colonies, it will be found, that the greater number was favorable to the patriots; and those were the result of the free will and discretion of the Executive, while the acts complained of, which have had a bearing against the patriots, were performed by the Executive in obedience to the laws, and were not the result of the exercise of discretion.

The acts of the Executive of the United States favorable to the Spanish provinces, I will notice in the order of time.

In Mr. Madison's Message of November, 1811, we find this passage: "An enlarged philanthropy, and an enlightened forecast, concur in imposing on the National Councils an obligation to take a deep interest in their destinies; to cherish reciprocal sentiments of good will; to regard the progress of events; and not to be unprepared for whatever order of things may be ultimately established." Here is a voluntary act, favorable to the cause of the provinces; and this recommendation was followed by an act of Congress giving a considerable sum to the people of Venezuela.

The next act favorable to the provinces, was the issuing by Mr. Madison to the collector of the customs instructions to admit the flag of the provinces; by which their ships became entitled, in the ports of the United States, to every privilege granted to the ships of other foreign Powers. The President was at liberty to have considered the patriots as rebels against their Sovereign, and to exclude their flag from our ports; or to consider them as a party in a civil war, and as such to admit their flag into our ports; he decided favorably to the patriots, and admitted their flag.

The next act of the Executive, favorable to the Spanish provinces, was the declaration by the present Chief Magistrate, that those provinces are partial to a civil war, in which their rights, as relates to neutrals, are equal to the rights of Spain; the President thus looking on the independence of the provinces as actually existing.

The next Executive act which has a bearing favorable to the Provinces, was the construction given by the President to the law of March, 1817, respecting the neutral duties of the United States. That act, in consequence of the omission of the words "district, colony, or people," in one of its sections, perhaps admitted of a construction that would have denied to the patriots equal rights with the subjects of Spain in the ports of the United States. We have employed some time on a bill intended to remedy the defect; but the construction given by the President to the act of March, 1817, had rendered its operation perfectly equal as related to Spain and the provinces, so far as the Executive authority is concerned. In a letter written by the Secretary of the Treasury, which may be considered as official, is this paragraph: "Having declared that the flags of Spain and of independent Governments established in Spanish America should be treated in the same manner in the ports of the United States; the Executive authority would not hesitate to consider the flag of Venezuela that of a foreign State, within the meaning of the fourth section of the act."

The last act that I shall mention, manifestly favorable to the provinces, is the act of sending commissioners to ascertain what is their situation; to prevent misunderstandings; to correct errors; perhaps to redress past grievances, and prevent their recurrence in future.

These various acts of the Executive, having a bearing favorable to the patriots, and all of them resulting from the discretion of the Executive, were overlooked by the Speaker, when he said that the acts of the Executive were all on one side, and bearing entirely against the colonists.

Let us now examine those acts of the Executive of which the Speaker complains as having so unfavorable a bearing against the patriots. These are, the proclamation of Mr. Madison, issued for the purpose of dispersing the armed force collected under Toledo, in violation of the law of the United States; and the suppression by the President of the establishment at Amelia Island, made by McGregor, with a force unlawfully prepared within the United States, and maintained by Aury, who pretended to act under the authority of Mexico, New Grenada, and Venezuela.

As to the proclamation which was issued for dispersing the armed force collected under Toledo, it will be remembered that President Madison was sworn faithfully to execute his office, the chief duty of which is to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. An act provides that when the execution of the laws of the United States is opposed or obstructed by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, the President may call forth the militia; but he shall by proclamation command those who thus oppose or obstruct the laws, to retire peaceably to their respective abodes, within a limited time. The force collected by Toledo came within the meaning of the law; and Mr. Madison had no discretion to exercise. The law pointed out his duty, and he performed it.

The suppression of the establishment made by McGregor, and continued by Aury at Amelia Island, was required by the interests and the honor of the United States. The world knew that the Executive was authorized to take East Florida against any foreign Power. Those who follow the profession of arms, must either be robbers or pirates, or they must have some power. The friends of Aury will not admit that he was a pirate; then they must contend that he served a foreign Power. Let us admit that Aury served the Republic of Venezuela, a Power whose flag is admitted into the ports of the United States, under the laws respecting the vessels of foreign Powers. If Venezuela had been formally acknowledged as an independent State, the act of 1811 authorizes the President to take Florida against the attempt of Venezuela to take possession of it; and the want of such formal acknowledgment cannot diminish the rights of the United States. It being the duty of the President to execute the laws, and the case contemplated by the act of 1811 having happened, a foreign Power having attempted to take possession of Florida, and having in execution of that attempt made an establishment at Amelia Island, the President was bound to suppress the establishment maintained there by Aury.

Had no such law existed, the conduct of the President would have been worthy of approbation. A nation has a right to protect itself from the evils of bad neighborhoods. Upon this principle it was that the act for taking possession of East Florida was passed. So when Louisiana was transferred from Spain to France, our Minister at Paris most seriously remonstrated against the occupation of that country by the forces of Napoleon; and many of our distinguished politicians urged the expediency of taking Louisiana by war, rather than admit a dangerous neighbor to come there. Perhaps Louisiana might have been obtained by war, at an expense of one hundred and fifty millions; but the wisdom and moderation of Mr. Jefferson obtained it by purchase for the tenth part of the sum. It was to preserve herself from the evils of bad neighborhood that Prussia involved herself in war, first with Great Britain and afterwards with France, rather than have French troops in possession of Hanover. Is there any nation more interested in avoiding neighbors of a certain description than the United States? Would it be safe to allow Florida to be revolutionized by black troops? We have said, and I presume will continue to say, that no Power except Spain shall come there.

I have shown that the conduct of the Executive, as respects Spain and her American possessions, has been impartial. The honorable member did not indeed say that it was partial; but he could not be understood as meaning any; thing else, when the acts of the Executive were all on one side, bearing entirely against the colonists. I will now proceed to show that the conduct of the Executive, as respects those parties, has been most honorable.

The conduct of the Executive has been contrasted with that of the French Government in the war of our revolution; and the conduct of the Government of France has been denominated magnanimous. A comparison more favorable to the Executive of the United States could not have been made. Let us see what was the conduct of the Government of France during our revolution, previous to the treaty of 1778, by which France and the United States became allies. Secretly the Government of France was granting us aid in money, arms, and warlike stores, while publicly she affected to observe a strict neutrality. A State paper, published by that Government about the year 1780, says, "His Majesty prohibited, very severely, the exportation of arms and warlike stores, provided they were intended for North America." He prohibited the privateers to sell their prizes in France, and his subjects to purchase them." The same State paper reveals the motive by which the French Government was actuated in becoming the ally of the United States, which certainly was not a desire for the liberty and happiness of the United States: it says, "in treating with the Americans after they became independent, the King exercised the right inherent in his sovereignty, with no other view than to put an end to the predominant power which England abused in every quarter of the globe." Such was the motive and such the conduct of the Government of France, now denominated magnanimous, and preferred to the conduct of the Executive of the United States. And what has been the conduct of the Executive towards Spain and the provinces? That conduct has been open and impartial; the ships of both are admitted in our waters; they equally enjoy the right of hospitality; either party may purchase ships, arms, and warlike stores. Conduct so impartial and just is truly neutral and honorable.

Sir, I am deeply impressed with a sense of the obligations which we are under to France for the aid granted to us during the war of our Revolution; but I cannot admit that the conduct of the French Government is compatible, either for honor or magnanimity, with that of the Government of the United States. The declaration made by the President that no privilege in commerce would be accepted from the Spanish provinces that shall not become common to other nations, is one of the most disinterested and magnanimous that ever was made by a Government. It is an example of liberality worthy to be admired and imitated by other Governments. It is worthy of the Government of the most just of all people.

The Speaker disapproves of the moderation which the Executive has manifested towards Spain. He would press upon Spain in her state of embarrassment; and he endeavors to prove that Spain cannot and will not make war. If such be truly the situation of Spain, how ungenerous is it to seize the present time to press upon her! How very different are the sentiments which have heretofore been expressed by the Executive. In a letter written by the present Chief Magistrate, then Secretary of State, in 1812, to General Matthews, will be found these passages: "In neither of these contingencies was it the policy of the Executive to wrest the province forcibly from Spain; but only to occupy it with a view to prevent its falling into the hands of any foreign Power, and to hold that pledge, under the existing peculiarity of the circumstances of the Spanish Monarchy, for a just result in an amicable negotiation with Spain." "I may add, that, although due sensibility has been always felt for the injuries which were received from the Spanish Government in the last war, the present situation of Spain has been a motive for a moderate and pacific policy towards her." I ask, if these sentiments are not magnanimous and honorable, and worthy of the United States?

When France wronged the United States, they made war upon her; when England wronged the United States, they made war upon her. Having attacked the greatest and most warlike nations, the forbearance of the United States to make war against Spain, during a period of long continued, and still continuing distress, will not be attributed to any unworthy motives; for Spain, we are told by the Speaker, cannot and will not make war. How ungenerous then would it be to take a step against Spain which would undoubtedly produce war, if England was the offended Power!

I have said, sir, that the measure proposed is pregnant with evil, and may jeopardize the safety of the United States. I hope and trust that we are able to resist any combination that may be formed against us, even at this time. I am confidently certain, that in twenty years we shall be able to set at defiance the power of the world: and in a century we shall be able to give it laws. I therefore, deem it most important, that we should let the present moment of peril pass away; that we should gain time, and go on to improve our resources by the arts of peace.

If any event can jeopardize our safety, it is a war with the combined Powers of Europe at this time. Sir, if a hundred measures were devised for the purpose of destroying our national existence, and this was among them, it would be the very measure that I should deem most likely to succeed. If there is a measure, the adoption of which can produce such an event, it is one which shall amount to a declaration that we are the patrons of revolutions; one, by which we shall proclaim, that, wherever a province shall make insurrection against the authority of the parent country, we will consider it our business and duty to take the new people by the hand and introduce them into the family of nations.

Sir, the coalition still hangs together. And what is their common bond of union? It is the cause of legitimacy—the cause of hereditary thrones. The combined Powers have proven, that they do not mean to confine their views to Europe, by interfering in the controversy between the Courts of Spain and Brazil. Is it not the object of their holy leagues to bring back mankind to the state of mental darkness in which they were for ages subsequent to the reign of Constantine? Has not Great Britain signified to you, that the Mississippi ought to be your boundary? Has not France done the same? Has not Spain claimed that boundary? Do not these circumstances indicate concert between those Powers? Shall we then, at such a time, do an act utterly useless to us, equally useless to Buenos Ayres, (for the Speaker admits, that there can be no concert between us, and that we have not the means to aid her;) an act, the effect of which will be to bring Congress and the President into collision; which act may by any possibility, however remote, involve us in a contest with the combined European Powers?

MARCH, 1818.

Spanish American Provinces.

H. OF R.

Sir, let us hold this language to the people of the provinces: "Ask us not to engage in war in your cause—you have men and money; arms and ships you can purchase. The cause you are engaged in is one to be decided by yourselves. We grant you every privilege of a Power. We will not quarrel with your former master. We will not quarrel with the combined Powers of Europe. Achieve your independence, and force Spain to acknowledge it. We have no authority to judge of the contest and award the prize." Sir, when Doctor Franklin, in 1777, requested the King of France to acknowledge the independence of the United States, the King answered, that he could look upon the independence of the United States as actually existing; but, that it did not belong to him to acknowledge it, for he had no right to judge of it. Neither does it belong to the United States to judge of and acknowledge the independence of Buenos Ayres.

But, it is said, that the acknowledgment of the independence of the Republic of La Plata will give Spain no just cause of war. Sir, justice is not always the law of nations. The law of nations is the usage of nations. Let us see what is the usage of nations, when one Power acknowledges the independence of provinces which have shaken off their allegiance to another. It will not be necessary to go further back than the war of our Revolution. From the eventual treaty of alliance entered into between the United States and France, it appears, that the latter Power expected a declaration of war on the part of Great Britain to be a probable consequence of the acknowledgment of the independence of the United States. The Treaty of Alliance recites, that the parties "have thought it necessary to take into consideration the means of strengthening those engagements, and of rendering them useful to the safety and tranquillity of the parties; particularly in case Great Britain, in resentment of that connexion, and of the good correspondence, which is the object of the said treaty, (meaning the treaty of commerce,) should break the peace with France." Accordingly, no sooner was the fact that a treaty of commerce existed between France and the United States communicated to the Court of London, than war was declared.

It may be said, that, with France, we had a treaty of commerce, and also an eventual treaty of alliance. But, with Holland we entered into a treaty of commerce only; yet no sooner was that fact disclosed to the British Court, by the capture of Mr. Laurens, than war was declared against Holland.

Thus, it appears that a treaty of commerce entered into with provinces who have thrown off their allegiance to the parent country, gives to that country cause of war, according to the usage of nations. Then acknowledgment must be equally a cause of war; and, indeed, a treaty of commerce must be expected to be the necessary and immediate consequence of the acknowledgment of a new Power, and the interchange of public Ministers. And it is not without reason, that acknowledgment of the independence of a new Power is deemed cause of war by the parent Power. If you acknowledge the independence of Buenos Ayres, you undertake to judge of the controversy between that Republic and Spain. You deny the dependence of Buenos Ayres upon Spain. You will thus undertake to deny what Spain claims as a right.

It is not sufficient to satisfy the Committee that the measure proposed will not produce war, to show that Spain has not resources for a vigorous prosecution of war. It must be shown that the Government of Spain has not pride and a sense of honor. If you offend Spanish pride by an insult that would not be borne by England or France, war will follow; we shall make conquests; and then the Powers of Europe will interfere. Sir, I am not disposed to go to war with Spain on account of our old claim for spoiliations on commerce. Spain has also a claim against you for spoiliations committed by vessels equipped in your waters. Pay your merchants their claims; charge the sum to Spain; credit her for the spoiliations for which you are responsible; the day of account will arrive hereafter.

We have been told of the additional security which the independence of Buenos Ayres will give to liberty against the combinations of crowned heads; and that gratitude will attach the new Republics to the United States. Sir, it is by preserving the United States that liberty is to be secured against the combinations of crowned heads. And experience proves the brief duration of the gratitude of nations. England aided the Dutch to throw off the yoke of Spain; yet, no long time elapsed before the ocean was dyed with English and Dutch blood, shed in adverse conflicts between the two nations. France aided the United States to shake off the yoke of England; and our first war with a civilized nation was against France. Nations are not governed by gratitude. They are governed by interest and policy.

Let us leave the severance of the empires of the world to the people concerned. Let us not interfere in the war between Spain and her colonies. Let us not jeopardize the happiness of this happy people. Let us support the Executive in giving to the nations of the earth an example of justice and moderation. So shall we preserve the peace of our country, and the prosperity of the our people. For, however unjust may be designs of those who govern the nations of Europe, they have too much respect for the opinions of their own subjects, and of posterity, to make an unprovoked attack upon a nation whose distinguished characteristic is moderation and justice.

Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts.—Afflicted, as I have several days been, with bad health, nothing but an imperious duty to explain and defend my motives could have induced me to rise on this occasion. The friends of this proposition are charged with intentions hostile to Spain, and unfriendly to the Administration. War, with all its calamities, is brought into view, and deemed to be inseparably connected with this amendment. Its horrors are eloquently and pathetically described. We almost hear the trumpets sound, the cannons roar, the shrieks of the dying, and the shouts of victory. We recover from this delirium, and inquire, What is the subject of debate? And we find, to our astonishment, that it is a simple proposition to appropriate a sum of money to be intrusted with the Executive and to be applied to defray the expenses of a Minister to Buenos Ayres, provided the President, in his discretion, should deem it prudent and proper to send one. This, then, is the subject and ground of alarm.

Sir, if this were to endanger the peace of the country, I would alter my determination, and give my vote against the amendment. I have too lately witnessed the dangers and distresses of war, to rashly expose my constituents to a renewal of its calamities. I have seen too much of violence and faction to induce me lightly to assume a hostile attitude. I have felt, too seriously, what madness and treason can do in times of public calamity, to hazard my country's peace, without great necessity and great reflection. No, sir, much as Spain has injured and insulted us, I should, in the present condition of the world, pause and deliberate before I would make the final appeal.

I am aware that remarks have been made and motives avowed in this debate, which might induce an indifferent auditor to suspect that something was intended which was not contained in the measure itself. Hence I have found it necessary to enter into the debate, that my reasons for my vote may be distinctly understood, and that my motives may appear entirely different from those which have been ascribed to the advocates of this measure.

The act, in itself, is not hostile. It is unnecessary to refer gentlemen to authorities to prove this; every one knows, and the opponents of the amendment admit, that to do the act is not cause of war. Spain would not resent it if she could. Gentlemen pretend that it is dishonorable to calculate on Spain's disability. I think not. If we were to do an unlawful act against Spain, it would be neither correct nor honorable to rest our impunity upon her weakness. But, when the act is lawful and right, and that which we might, at discretion, do or omit, it is then proper to inquire whether she has the power to resist it, and to calculate on her weakness.

And what reason have you to expect that Spain would take umbrage at this? Will she engage in a contest with the United States, which would prove fatal to her power in South America? Sir, she has been struggling for years to keep up the appearance of power in her provinces. Her means are exhausted, and her armies are wasted, and her power is nearly annihilated. At home, ignorance, bigotry, despotism, and beggary, abound. Her miserable stolen monarch, the usurper of his father's throne, has rewarded the defenders of their country with banishment, imprisonment, and death. The Government is bankrupt, the people are starved, and distrust and treachery everywhere prevail. Would Spain, poor, emaciated, decrepit Spain, enter the lists with young, vigorous, athletic America? Such an act would consummate her folly and madness, finish her calamities, and seal her destruction.

Sir, I regret that her condition has been compared to ours during the late war, and that the exposure of the emptiness of her treasury, by her Minister, is resembled to the report of Mr. Dallas. Is it thus that gentlemen will magnify their own weakness and debasement? Were we as poor and beggarly then as Spain is now? She has been, for years, the scene of a desolating and vindictive war; alternately exhausted, pillaged, and robbed by her foes, the French, and her friends, the British; nothing moveable remained, which was capable of exciting their cupidity. Armies fighting, advancing, and retreating, until every vestige of property was swept from the face of the earth. Not only the revenues of the Government, but the resources of the people, were cut off and consumed; and this cruel, vindictive, and exterminating war was a struggle between the vassals of the usurper of his father's throne and the usurper of that usurpation. Was your country, in the late war, like this? Sir, the resources of the nation had not been touched. Your Secretary, it is true, gave you a dismal account of the wants of your Treasury; but the money was in the pockets of the people, and when you asked for it you had it. The spirit of the Congress did not keep pace with the patriotism of the people; there was an unaccountable timidity to exact the means to prosecute the war. Some spectre of faction, some ghost of the Hartford Convention, with a dagger in his hand, or something else, I know not what, checked and deterred the Representatives of the day from calling so fast as the people were willing to pay. Sir, I repeat it, our resources had scarcely been touched at the peace. Had your country been made the theatre of the war, like Spain? Your enemy had scarcely ventured to pollute your soil with his foot. He had, in a few instances, made sudden inroads, committed depredations, and fled. He ran to this city, and with vandal barbarity demolished your public buildings, the monuments of elegance and art, and ran back again. It is true, he stopped at Alexandria, and took a little bread, which he wanted; but this was in token of friendship and love. With the same friendly motive, he occupied Castine, that the people of New England might, with greater facility, obtain a few English goods, which they needed. There were a few other instances where private houses were pillaged of caps, and linen, and other little matters; but, in the main, the individual resources of the people had not been impaired by the enemy or the Government. Is it right, then, does it comport with American feelings, to rank your country with this miserable Spain?

But, I confess, I do not well perceive the consistency of the honorable gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. FORSYTH,) who opposes this amendment, and yet would not hesitate to occupy the Floridas. The amendment under consideration is inoffensive, and to occupy Florida is an act of war. The gentleman deprecates war; he would not even place money in the hands of the President to send, at his discretion, a Minister to the provinces of La Plata, for fear of a rupture, and still he would take the Floridas, which is war of itself. But it has been contended, that the combined Powers of Europe would take part with Spain against us, for an act entirely innocent, and perfectly consistent with the laws of nations. Sir, I apprehend that Europe has enough to do at home. It is indispensable that France should still be occupied. That ill-fated nation cannot yet be trusted to govern herself, nor is Europe safe if France be free. They who are afraid to withdraw their armies from France, would scarcely venture to engage in a remote and hazardous enterprise to subvert the liberties of the Western world. Monarchs are not over-fond of opposing their mercenaries to the soldiers of liberty. There is an enthusiasm in liberty which is extremely contagious, which may communicate itself to the ranks of the enemy, and produce disaffection, desertion, and defeat. It was the aid afforded to the sons of freemen which cost the amiable and unfortunate Louis his crown and his head.

And what is the imposing spectacle which Europe this moment exhibits? Is her coalition indissoluble? A single, solitary individual, without power or friends, is placed upon a rock in the midst of an ocean, guarded by a delegation from every Power in Europe, lest he should escape, prostrate their powers, and subvert the Governments of the earth. This is not all. The gigantic power of Russia is destined to make the rest of Europe tremble. Alexander has, with his myrmidons, rushed from the frozen regions of the North to taste the luxuries of France. He has already kindly relieved the brave Poles from the trouble of self-government, and settled their feuds by governing them himself. Like the Goths, and Vandals, and Huns, of former times, we shall shortly see him quitting his inhospitable rocks, and mountains, and frosts, and snows, to seek and enjoy the genial skies and luxuriant soils of France and Italy. All Europe views him with jealous eyes, and are on the alert at his every movement. He casts a longing look at the Bosphorus and Dardanelles, and contemplates, with solicitude, the time when his fleets shall pass from the Black Sea to the Mediterranean, to dispute with England the empire of the ocean. Will Russia and the other Powers, thus watching and jealous of each other, engage in a contest of doubtful success, of certain danger, and inevitable loss? Let any or all the Powers of Europe engage in an American war, and you will witness scenes in France which surpass description. France is waiting only until the attention of the allies shall be drawn to some other object, to rise in her strength, burst her fetters, and annihilate her weak and tottering Government. And if no other reason prevented the coalition from joining to subjugate America, the difficulty of dividing the plunder would be alone sufficient. Were the South American provinces to be partitioned among the Powers of Europe, England would insist on a part, and give her a part, and she inevitably secures the commerce of the whole.

But, it has been intimated, that England would fight us if we adopt this amendment. Sir, I think I have shown that Spain cannot fight us alone, and the honorable gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) admits that England would not join her. He even regrets that she would not, and wishes that she might. If Spain cannot enter the contest without England, and it is admitted that England will not, it would seem that the danger is at an end. But there are better reasons than the gentleman's admission that England would not fight the United States, she would be certain of hard fighting, and doubtful of success or glory. She is still smarting with the wounds which we have inflicted on her. She secretly wishes the independence of the provinces, and would, indirectly, aid in their cause. A market for the annual sale of £50,000,000 sterling of our manufactures, which she would acquire by the independence of the provinces, would not be lost sight of by her statesmen. This alarm of war, sir, is fanciful and visionary.

But an alarm has been sounded that the advocates of the amendment are opposing the Executive; and is this true? Am I, who very lately well nigh lost my right to a seat in this House for having been in a condition which exposed me to Executive influence, so soon to rebel against the President? Shall I, who have experienced the droppings of the Executive sanctuary, turn my heel against my benefactor? Should this be the case, it would only prove what experience has always proved, that gratitude for past, influences less than the prospect of future favors. That it is not the man who has had an office, but he who is seeking one, who is the humble tool of the Executive.

But, sir, although neither past favors nor future prospects will ever induce me to follow in the wake of any man, still I insist, and will prove, that the proposed amendment is in perfect accordance with the views and feelings of the President, as discovered in all his official communications to this House. While I prove that the act itself is proper, I will show that, as an individual, I am not ungrateful. Ingratitude is a charge which would set heavy; it is a crime of which no one has yet been found who would acknowledge himself guilty. I have the utmost confidence in the correctness of the course which has been, and will be, pursued by the President in regard to these provinces. To send the Commissioners to inquire into their condition, was prudent and proper, and consistent with his regard for their liberties and our safety. That the President ardently wished for their emancipation, and that his course of policy was conformable to that wish, I have never doubted. He has admitted their flag on the same terms as that of Spain; he has sent three gentlemen to inquire into their condition. By this measure we say to the President, "Sir, with that solicitude which characterizes a love of country and regard for the rights of man, you have sent Commissioners to South America. They are to ascertain the strength and stability of their Governments. On their return you will be able to judge what ulterior steps are to be taken. Should their report be unfavorable, nothing further will be done; but should it appear to you that a nation has been established on the southern division of the American continent, you have the means to recognise them, provided you should deem it consistent with the honor and interest of this nation." These are my reasons for giving this power. Sir, is this hostility to the President? Those gentlemen who are disposed to take the reputation of the President into their exclusive custody, are unwilling to intrust him with $18,000, lest he should abuse the trust.

This grant is authoritative, but not directory. Why, it is asked, not leave it upon the same footing as other diplomatic appointments? I answer that the President would no doubt venture, upon his own responsibility, to send a Minister to any Government already established and recognised, provided the public good required it. But, here, is a subject of some delicacy, and the advice of opinion, at least, of the people's Representatives would, no doubt, be agreeable to him. Here is a new nation sprung into existence by bursting the bonds of oppression, as we did. Whether we should be the first to recognise them, or wait until the monarchies of Europe should have done it, are questions of policy as well as principle. Should the amendment prevail, and should he determine, on the return of the Commissioners, to send a Minister, he would feel a confidence that the people would not complain, nor would he be exposed to have the correctness of his course questioned or criticised in discussing the next appropriation bill.

Sir, there is a character of hostility given to this measure which it does not deserve. This very session we have passed an act, far more hostile to Spain, and favorable to the provinces, than the amendment under consideration. An act expressly offering the flag of the provinces protection in all our ports. Yet, when an innocent proposition is submitted to vest a discretion in the President to do a harmless act, you take the alarm, and denounce its advocates as hostile to Spain and unfriendly to the President. Sir,

But there is no proof that Buenos Ayres has an independent government, or that the people are sufficiently populous or powerful and intelligent to maintain their independence. I am aware that our knowledge of their political condition is still imperfect. For that reason I would do nothing in haste. I would wait the return of the Commissioners; and this is what this amendment contemplates. We, however, do know that the province of Buenos Ayres is extensive and populous; that it extends sixteen hundred miles by one thousand, and that it has cities containing from 70,000 to 100,000 inhabitants. We know, also, that the principal cities, Buenos Ayres and Potosi, and, indeed, all the others, are in possession of the patriots. Now where are the royal forces? The population of this province is almost exclusively in the cities. The settlements commenced in this way at first, as a protection against the savages. If these cities are under the government of the patriots, what does Ferdinand govern? The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. LOWMEDE) intimates that Potosi has lately been in possession of the royal forces, and that it is not certain but that they may occupy it now. Sir, how could St. Martin cross the Andes with Potosi in possession of his enemy? Yet, he has done this, expelled the royalists from Chili, and has, probably ere this, liberated Peru. I think I may, with safety, affirm that no royalist has ventured, during these last five years, to enter this province.

But the last, and, as I believe, the most illiberal objection, is yet to be noticed:—The independence of South America would not profit us! Sir, I regret that such an objection should come from such a source. The honorable gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) in the true spirit of calculation, apprehends that the exports of these provinces would rival ours. Nay, more, this degraded country is to become our rival in power, and to threaten the existence of our navy. In one breath we are told, these people are too ignorant and imbecile for self-government; in the next, let them be free, and they will become mighty rivals, and engross our commerce and vanquish our navy. They are to build ships without timber, (for they bring it now from Paraguay,) and they are to navigate them without seamen.

Sir, when the Portuguese monarchy was transferred to the Brazils, we were not then alarmed at the danger of rivalry. We sent them a Minister at the rate of nine thousand dollars a year, and nine thousand dollars outfit. These South Americans are not destined to become commercial rivals to any nation. Many of them lie within the torrid zone—a country favorable to production, but not to enterprise. Your ships, your manufactures, your carrying trade, will find a brisk and constant demand, from a people with whom labor and enterprise are not familiar.

Sir, let us not indulge an unreasonable jealousy where the cause of liberty and humanity are concerned. I hope and trust that men whose fathers fought and bled in such a cause, will never be deterred by considerations selfish as these.

The hardy sons of the North will never be in danger from the freedom of the South; our sailors are inured to storms and tempests, and experienced in hardships and peril. Their enterprise will not yield to that of any people on earth. It is even childish to apprehend danger from the independence of South America; but there are strong and powerful reasons why we should rejoice at and encourage such an event. And we do rejoice at and encourage it. The President of the United States wishes, as ardently as any one, for their emancipation. He whose whole life has been devoted to freedom, cannot, does not, will not, look with indifference on events of such interest.

Sir, the people of the United States do, and ever will, take a most lively interest in the freedom of their brethren of the South. It is the cause in which we fought, and bled, and conquered. This nation now stands alone, the only established Republic on earth, like a solitary rock in the ocean, where the storms of tyranny have burst upon its brow, and the billows of faction broke harmless at its base. Will it not then be a source of consolation, that we can hail one Republic as a sister, take her by the hand, and encourage her in her advance to freedom?

Sir, I have thus far tired the patience of the Committee, in showing, that this measure is innocent in itself, and is neither hostile to Spain, nor unfriendly to the Administration. I trust I have succeeded in proving that the course of the Executive is coincident with this measure, and that whatever other gentlemen may feel, my views are to accord with, and support the Executive on this subject; and that the whole amount of the proposition is, to give the President the means, and to leave it to his entire discretion whether he shall use them or not.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, said, that at this late period of the discussion, he could only claim the indulgence of the Committee upon a principle, which never failed to secure to those who asked it their patient attention. He found that, upon this occasion, he should be in a small minority of the delegation from his own State, and was, therefore, peculiarly solicitous of explaining the reasons of his differing from his honorable colleagues, for whose opinions he felt the greatest respect and deference. There was, indeed, another reason of not less importance. This proposition had been supported upon a variety of principles, and by very various arguments; nor would gentlemen be surprised to learn that his own views of a subject, which had so many aspects, had not been exactly presented, when they recur to the fact, that scarcely any two persons, who had spoken on this occasion, had entirely coincided. The honorable Speaker had declared himself for this proposition, but was opposed to war or the occupation of Florida. The gentleman from Georgia is against this proposition, but is in favor of the occupation of Florida. My friend from Louisiana is in favor of both; and my friend from South Carolina (Mr. LOWMEDE) is in favor of neither. Among these various opinions, I am inclined to the adoption of this proposition, though I coincide otherwise entirely in the pacific policy of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means; an opinion which I shall probably endeavor to support upon grounds considerably different from those which have been advanced by the Speaker.

Sir, I have said, on a former occasion, that I am opposed to involving the nation in war, unless a great and important occasion shall require it. I have said, that I am unwilling to entangle ourselves in the contest now raging between Spain and the provinces of South America, but, that I would maintain an honorable, impartial, and dignified neutrality. I am opposed to war, because I see no adequate advantages to be derived from it; because the occasion does not seem to justify so important and momentous a measure; because the amount of the losses for which we seek indemnity, and of the property we wish to get possession of, bears no comparison with the hazards which we must encounter, whenever we engage in war; and, because I conceive a state of war always replete with danger to the principles of our Constitution. It has long been my settled and deliberate opinion, that nothing is so apt to sap the foundation of our liberties as frequent wars. Every laurel that we gain is at the hazard of some principle of free government; every field that we win endangers some part of our Constitution. The urgency must, therefore, be pressing, the necessity imperious, which drives us to war; and, were I less convinced than the gentleman from South Carolina, of the unprofitable results of a Spanish war in other respects, the consideration I have mentioned would suffice to dissuade me from giving my voice for waging it in the present state of things.

But, sir, while opposed to war; while averse to every measure which will probably lead to it, and which the honor and interest of the nation does not require, I have said that I would preserve a strict, impartial, and dignified neutrality; and I do most sincerely believe, that, in the pursuit of this end, the measure under consideration ought to be adopted.

I cannot but regret, Mr. Chairman, the manner in which this proposition has been discussed, and the remarks that have been introduced by its opposers. I allude to the harsh expressions that have been used in speaking of these unhappy people, who have long been struggling to throw off the most galling yoke, the most hateful slavery that has ever yet tortured and degraded man. The honorable gentleman from Georgia tells us, that he sympathises in their cause, and earnestly wishes for their success. I doubt not his sincerity. Yet I would appeal to every member of the Committee, whether the harsh colors in which he has represented them, and the dark picture he has drawn of their ignorance and depravity, is calculated to transfuse into other bosoms the sympathy of his own. I will appeal to himself whether his glowing language is likely to win us to their cause, and to disseminate, through the nation, an interest in their prosperity, when he represented them as having lit the torch of revolution, without possessing a sentiment of liberty; with conducting it by massacres and enormities, which render them unworthy of freedom; and with terminating it in a tyranny, not inferior to that which they have overthrown. According to this view of the subject, their Revolution has commenced in ignorance; its course has been stained by murder; its end has been the subjugation of the people; and we should feel not one emotion of pity for their sufferings, or of solicitude for their welfare. Sir, I am aware that this course of remark was, in some measure, drawn from the gentleman by the observations of the Speaker. But, while he protests against the comparison of the patriots with the heroes of our Revolution, he might have spared them, at least, the contrast which he has so vividly drawn. He tells us that they hugged their chains, and loved the tyranny; and that the origin of their Revolution had no foundation in the principles of freedom. He does not attend sufficiently, I think, to the nature of revolution, or sufficiently consider the situation of this people. What would be said of that man, who, turning over the pages of our history, should charge the sages and patriots of our Revolution with hugging their chains and loving their tyrant, because of the repeated and loyal remonstrances and memorials presented to the Crown? What should we think of the statesman, who, looking only to the surface of things, should attribute our glorious struggle to a mean and mercenary spirit, which revolted only at a twelve-penny stamp, or a trivial duty on a pound of tea? Sir, these who sat at the helm were men of profound wisdom and political sagacity: deeply versed in the knowledge of their rights as freemen, and intimately acquainted with the principles of human action; and, in conducting us over the tempestuous ocean of revolution, they looked with a steady eye to the liberties of their country, while they availed themselves of all these popular breezes, to waft the vessel of state into the haven of freedom and independence. Such may be the case with the Revolution of the Spanish provinces. We are too imperfectly acquainted with the facts which led to their convulsion to pronounce them destitute of the noble principles of liberty.

Nor are sufficient allowances made for the situation of these unhappy people for many centuries. Two or three hundred years have they been groaning under a tyranny the most oppressive that has ever overwhelmed a wretched people. Nothing parallel to the misery and slavery of Spanish America can be found in the annals of the inhabitable globe. It has been governed with an iron rod, by monarchs who have been most distinguished always by whatever is most horrible in tyranny, most detestable in bigotry, and most contemptible in imbecility. They have been involved, for centuries, in the deepest gloom of ignorance and superstition, into which it is the interest of tyrants forever to plunge the victims of their power. And when, at length, a beam of liberty has pierced the cloud which has so long benighted them, shall we be surprised that it has not, in a moment, dispelled the darkness, and spread abroad, throughout their land, the splendor of the meridian sun? Let us rather rejoice that light hath broken in upon them, and look with confidence to yet brighter moments. Let us remember that the throes of revolution are most violent, where the mind has been least enlightened; nor wonder that, in the struggle to throw off the Spanish yoke, greater outrages should be committed than in our own Revolution. We are told of the massacres of their enemies, and the enormities of their Revolution. Unfortunately these are evils, too, necessarily connected with civil war. Even we were not without them. The Carolinas were the scene, during our Revolution, of events that we shudder to recollect. Brother was armed against brother—neighbor against neighbor. Our foe, too, was generous and merciful, compared with the cruel and unrelenting tyrants of those wretched and struggling people. Yes, sir, the cruelties perpetrated on the Spanish patriots, by the inhuman monsters who seek their subjugation, cannot find a parallel in the annals of nations, if you except the history of Spain herself. Tear but away the page in which her bloody deeds are recorded, and you will find no parallel to her late enormities. She is, indeed, "her only parallel." And is it to be expected that, in a war like this, forbearance can be found among those who are goaded into madness by treachery and cold-blooded massacre? It is impossible!

Sir, it is for these struggling people that I own my sympathies are excited. I am not ashamed to avow them. I know it is not very fashionable to declaim in favor of liberty, and had I the disposition and the talent I should be saved the effort by the nervous eloquence of the gentleman who spoke on yesterday, (Mr. ROBERTSON.) I always listen to him with pleasure, but on yesterday with delight. His speech was dictated by a Roman spirit, and a genuine republicanism;—a republicanism that knows no change; which, during the lapse of nearly thirty years that I have known him, has remained unaltered, and unimpaired.

There is, Mr. Chairman, another course of remark that I cannot but regret on this occasion. It has been said that this proposition implies a censure on the Executive. I am well aware that the gentleman from South Carolina did not mean to intimate anything personal by the remark. Yet it cannot but have its effect.

[Mr. LOWMESE rose and explained, saying that, as he frequently differed from the Executive himself, he could not disapprove a similar freedom of opinion in others.] Mr. TUCKER continued—

The explanation of the gentleman was unnecessary. His uniform urbanity furnished a sufficient assurance that the remark was not intended with any personal view. But, though this is the case, yet the intimation that the proposition is not in consonance with Executive opinion, is not without effect. The high standing and commanding talents of the gentleman may render it personally unimportant to him, whether his course conflicts with Executive opinion or not. It is not always so with others. The Executive branch of the Government, though it possesses not a very extensive direct influence, is vastly powerful in its indirect and reflected influence over this body. Elected by the suffrages of the whole nation, there are many who look upon him as the Northern Star of the political firmament, which alone preserves its place in the heavens, "fixed and unshaken of motion;" and by him they discern the aberrations of the lesser constellations of the system. I will not pretend to say that to a certain extent this may not have its advantages; but this I can venture to advance, that he who acts with candor and frankness, and with a sole view to the honor and interest of the nation, will not fail to receive approbation rather than censure for his frankness and independence. Our constituents will deal liberally by us so long as our motives are pure; and by this standard I am willing to be tried whenever I am found in collision with the Executive. But to whom are we to look on the present occasion in order to discern its opinions? To either of the two honorable chairmen, from whom we might most reasonably expect such information? No; they differ with each other. And the occupation of Florida, which one of them proposes, seems generally to be supposed at variance with the Cabinet opinion. Thus situated, I beg leave not only to disregard the intimation that this measure implies censure, but I utterly disavow and disclaim, on my part, any such idea. So far from it, that, according to my notion of things, the vote which I shall give will be founded on principles that confirm the propriety of the course pursued by the Government. What is the character of the proposition? It appropriates the usual sum for the outfit and salary of a Minister, for the purpose of sending a representative of this Government to Buenos Ayres, whenever the Executive, in the exercise of its Constitutional discretion, shall think it advisable. It commands nothing; but it intimates, in a proper and Constitutional manner, the readiness of this House to go hand in hand with the Executive, in the interesting measure of opening an intercourse with the Government of La Plata, by sending and receiving Ministers. It is in this way, and in this way only, that I understand the proposition. Is there any direct censure of the Executive here? Not at all. Is there any implied? A construction which would give to it this character, must be forced and unnatural. It is only upon the hypothesis of the gentleman from South Carolina, that such a construction has the air of plausibility. He tells us that, as the Executive have the power, this House ought not to interfere, unless there has been culpable negligence in its exercise; unless there has been unreasonable delay in sending a Minister to a foreign Power. If his doctrine be admitted as a general rule, yet, cases like the present, must form an exception to it. There is an evident distinction between sending Ministers to old established Governments, and sending a Minister for the first time to a new Government, separating itself from one to which it had formerly been attached. The one leads to no dangerous results; the other, we are told by gentlemen, will put to hazard the peace of the country. You may send a Minister to Turkey, or to Italy, to Denmark, or to Austria, without offending any one. But we are told that, if we send a Minister to La Plata, we shall involve ourselves in a quarrel with Spain. Be it so. Is it not, then, a sufficient reason for the expression of the opinion of this House, the immediate representative of the people—the Constitutional organ for declaring war—that a contemplated measure may lead to a state of war? Is it fair to expect the Executive branch of the Government to assume, alone, the responsibility of a measure involving such momentous consequences, while we stand silently by, unwilling to share the hazard of expressing an opinion? Or, is it consistent with the spirit of our Constitution, that the Executive should pursue a course which leads to hostilities, without an intimation of the opinion and wishes of the nation, expressed through the legislative body, on so important a concern? I think not, sir; and so far from censuring the forbearance of the Executive, hitherto to send a Minister to La Plata, I applaud it; because, although I do not think it would give just cause of war, yet, as it might lead to a rupture with Spain, a proper respect for the rights of this body required that they should await its opinion on the subject. Nor ought they to send a Minister, or to receive one, without the sanction of the legislative body, until the lapse of time, or the acquiescence of Spain shall have removed every hazard of hostility. It is, then, with a view of expressing, at this time, our willingness to go hand in hand with the Executive in this affair, whenever it shall think it advisable to act, that I shall give my support to this proposition.

But, gentlemen seem to consider this an interference with the Constitutional powers of the Executive. I do not think so. This House has at all times, and on all subjects, a right to declare its opinions, leaving to the Executive to act upon them or not, according to its pleasure. Nay, it has often done more. Wherever the act to be done by the Executive has been intimately connected with the Constitutional powers of this body, it has always deemed itself competent to act. Thus, before the treaty for the purchase of Louisiana was made, $2,000,000 were put at the disposal of the Government for a purchase of Southern territory. Here there was an act perfectly analogous. This body had no right to make a purchase, or to command the President to do so: but, as the purchase, if made, would have called upon the Legislative body for an appropriation, it was thought advisable to make it before hand, and thus indicate a correspondence of views on a subject, where correspondence was necessary. Could it have been said at this time, that the Executive were censured by Congress for saying to make a purchase the interest of the nation called for? Could it then have been objected that we were trenching upon the Constitutional powers of the Executive? Could it have been alleged to be useless and frivolous, because the Executive could make the purchase without a law? If not, neither can it be said now. The act of the Executive there would only have called for a small appropriation. The act of the Executive here might have the effect of a declaration of war, which it is within the Constitutional powers of the Legislative body alone to make. It would appear to me indeed of the utmost importance, that this correspondence of views should be preserved between these two branches of the Government. How embarrassing to the Executive must it be, if, after a treaty has been made calling for a large appropriation, this body should refuse to make it, and to sanction a contract entered into with a foreign State. How much more embarrassing, if, in the exercise of its Constitutional powers, the Executive should involve the nation in a war against the wishes of its Representatives. The jarring and confusion, and inefficiency that would result, might have the most fatal influence on the national success. No, sir, frankness and candor, and a free and unreserved communication of the feelings and opinions of each by the other, can never have any other than the happiest influence upon the National Councils.

The propriety of an expression of an opinion by this House on important occasions being established, it behooves us to consider the necessity of an interference at this time. Although we cannot perhaps speak very certainly of the situation of the Spanish provinces, yet, no doubt can exist that a civil war is at this time raging between the colonies and the mother country. Nor can there be more reason to doubt, that the power de facto in the Spanish province of Buenos Ayres is in the hands of the revolutionary patriots. And what is the principle of the law of nations applicable to this state of things? It is, that all foreign nations have a right to consider the two contending parties as two independent nations in all respects; that foreign nations have no right to judge which party is in the right, are justified in looking no farther than to the possession of the power, and in considering those who are possessed of the power, de facto, as the Government of the country. It is a wise and natural principle of the law of nations. It flows from the source of all national law: the rights of nations to protect themselves and to seek their own advantage without injury to others. Nations, it is said, treat and communicate with each other to procure commercial and other benefits; to obtain redress for injuries sustained, or to provide against their occurrence. It matters not to the neutral nation whether the parties in war are right or wrong; it may be its interest to make arrangements with both; it may be necessary to treat and communicate with each, to obtain satisfaction for wrongs, or to regulate their intercourse so as to prevent those infractions of neutral right, so common in a state of war.

In this view, it is only important to the neutral, that the parties are possessed of the physical power of doing injuries or conferring benefits. With a people possessed of the physical power, or power de facto, though in a state of civil war, the laws of nations admit the neutral to communicate as with an independent Power. They consider them in all respects as sovereign for the time being, and of course they justify communications with them by Ministers. If it were otherwise, nations at peace might suffer the direst wrongs from the parties in a civil war, without the possibility of redress, since the only way of demanding it is, by Ministers.

An application of these principles to our own case, will show the reasonableness of the rule. Spain and her colonies are at war; should they continue hostile (as Spain did with the Netherlands for half a century, without acknowledging their independence, though they were completely sovereign) can it be believed that, according to the laws of nations, all other Powers are to be debarred of the advantages of trade and commerce which they hold out? And how shall treaties of commerce be made without Ministers? Or, suppose the Republic of La Plata cruises on our commerce, or takes our shipping under illegal blockades, or attempts to enforce improper laws of contraband, or throws our citizens into dungeons, (as Spain has done with Mr. Meade,) shall we have no redress? Can we not demand satisfaction; the release of our property; the discharge of our citizens; and compensation for the injury? And how is this to be done without a Minister? And if through a Minister you make this demand, is it not a demand upon them as sovereigns for the time being? You have sent agents, or whatever they are called—(for gentlemen do not seem to agree by what name they are to be styled; they seem to be considered at present a sort of non-descripts)—and it is contended that they are not Ministers, nor invested with the mantle of ministerial inviolability—suppose they are seized and confined as spies? Will you have no right to send and demand their release? And if you send another representative shall he too be unprotected by the laws of nations? or will you send a Minister, whom, on the principles of all civilized people, they will be bound to respect? The latter assuredly—the laws of nations would justify you, and Spain would have no right to complain; because, although the mission would acknowledge the existence of civil war, and that the Power to whom you sent, held for the time being the power de facto, it would decide nothing as to the rights of the parties or the justice of their cause; and so long as the neutral avoids this, so long is the belligerent without just cause of complaint.

The principle contended for is rendered the more apparent by the reflection, that, according to the course of reflections I have pursued, it is in the power of either of the contending parties to compel the neutral to go to war or send a Minister. Thus, by capturing our vessels, or plundering our trade, the provinces of La Plata may compel us to send a Minister to demand redress, or drive us into a war, which, when terminated, must terminate through Ministers. Now, it is absurd to contend, that Spain would have a right to complain at the performance of an act which the laws of nations thus manifestly permits, from the principle of self-protection and national advancement; and it would be equally absurd to deny the right to send a Minister for the prevention of injury, when the right is admitted to send one for the redress of a wrong.

If, indeed, Mr. Chairman, I am not very much deceived, the error on both sides, in this debate, has been in considering the mere act of sending or receiving a Minister from these colonies, as a recognition of their entire and permanent independence of the Kingdom of Spain. We are groping in the dark, it is true, for want of works on national law; but, as far as I have been able to discover from those I have met with, the sending a Minister to one of two parties, in a civil war, is not of itself any recognition of the rightful independence of such party. It recognises the fact of civil war, which nobody can affect to deny. It acknowledges the sovereignty, for the time being, to reside in the possessor of the power, without pretending to decide to whom the right of sovereignty belongs. These principles are believed to be clearly supported by the authority of Vattel and Martens—both approved writers on the laws of nations. [Here Mr. T. read passages from these works.]

It is upon these principles that France received Ministers of Cromwell, and it is agreed, on all hands, that Charles, when restored, had no reason to complain. On these principles have the Ministers of Napoleon been received by every potentate of Europe. On these principles, even the mother country may send Ministers to her revolting colonies, without acknowledging their independence. They are sent from the necessities arising out of a state of war. By such necessity, they are justified in neutrals, and the mission or reception of a Minister, without an express recognition, cannot receive a construction that would imply a determination to side with either party. These ideas seem to receive countenance from the intimations of the Secretary of State, in his communications with Mr. Aguirre, which appear in this morning's paper. It is not very explicit, it is true, but it intimates sufficiently clear, that recognition must be by treaty, or by some act other than the mere entertaining a Minister.

From these considerations, it would seem that we have a right to send or receive a Minister from La Plata, that Republic being in possession of the power de facto, and that Spain would have no right to complain of the act.

But it is admitted that the writers on national law state, that the nation generally does complain. [See Martens.] Let us, then, cursorily examine whether it is probable that Spain will complain when no just ground of complaint is afforded. I contend she will not—

Because we have already encountered all the hazard and difficulty flowing from sending or receiving a mission, without its producing war; and because her patient endurance of what she avows to consider as a flagrant injury, contradicts the idea of her being disposed to go to war.

I have said we have encountered already all the difficulties of receiving or sending a Minister. We have sent to the South three agents, and we have received in this country (though informally) an agent from La Plata; an agent with whom, from the Secretary's letter, I think it appears he would have treated, if that agent's powers had been more full. Is it, therefore, probable Spain would take umbrage at our receiving or sending a public Minister, when she sees, at our Government seat, an agent, with whom we communicate, and who, after all, is but a Minister, though not treated with the ceremonies usual in intercourse with them? For, what is a Minister? An agent from one Power to another, invested with authority to communicate on public affairs. And I should be happy, if gentlemen can point out that passage in the law of nations which declares an individual sent on public affairs to be no Minister, or draws a distinction between an agent sent to a Court and a Minister. If there be a distinction, in the present instance, it must be on the supposition, (which is not true,) that La Plata, not being possessed of the power de facto, Aguirre is the private agent of Spain's rebellious subjects; and surely it cannot be less offensive to her, or less inconsistent with our duties as a nation, to receive a private agent from rebel subjects, than openly to receive a Minister, upon the true and manly and justifiable principle, that, whatever may be the rights of the parties, La Plata is, for the time being, possessed of the power de facto. Such a course appears to me both honorable and direct, and less dangerous to our peace.

Gentlemen have contended that the United States have manifested their impartiality by permitting a trade to South America in arms, and by admitting the Patriot flag into our ports. The first, it is true, is nothing extraordinary—the laws of nations permitting the trade in arms with nations at war, subject to the right of seizure for contraband. The latter—the admission of the flag—was an important manifestation of friendly dispositions, given two years ago by this Government. Don Onís complained of it. What was the reply of the Government? That a civil war was raging; that the United States could not decide the right, and was bound, by strict neutrality, to admit the flags of both. Was not this admission, and the avowal of it by the Government, a recognition of the fact, that, for the time being, during the continuance of the war, and the possession of the power de facto by the patriots, the patriot flag was to be considered as the flag of a sovereign Power? Was it not as complete a recognition as the receiving of a Minister to regulate that trade, which was in fact permitted? If so, (and the Spanish Minister seems, by his complaints, to have considered it a wrong to his nation,) then the great hazard which gentlemen apprehend from sending or receiving a Minister has already been incurred; and yet, after the lapse of two years, it has produced no hostility.

Again: The remonstrance of our Government against the blockade of Morillo, was founded on the principle, that as Spain was in a state of civil war with her colonies, and as Spanish America was really in the hands of the patriots, it was to be considered, during the existence of the war, as a sovereign Power. For, if not to be considered as sovereign, then they were to be regarded as dependents of Spain; and if dependents, then we have no right to trade with them without her permission, whether there be a blockade or not. The Spanish King was not, on the supposition of their being his dependents, bound to send a sufficient force to blockade. If they are to be considered in no other light than his property, he may issue a paper order from his bureau, forbidding the trade, and if our vessels attempt it, they are liable to seizure and condemnation. But our Government have very properly acted upon the principle which I am now contending for. They consider our merchants as having a right to trade with those provinces of Spain which have the power de facto. They consider Spain as much bound to establish an efficient blockade, as she would be if engaged in war with any other independent sovereign Power. They have protested against Morillo's blockades as inefficient, and contrary to national law; and they have demanded compensation for six of our merchant ships which have been taken under it. They have thus encountered already the greatest difficulty of recognition. That greatest difficulty arises out of the question of trade. If we recognise, our merchants will trade. If they trade, we must protect them against Spain. But this difficulty has been already encountered in the remonstrance against the blockade, and can no longer be estimated in considering the question before us.

Sir, when I reflect upon these things—that this Government has already, in so many ways, avowed and acted upon its right to consider the Spanish provinces, during the civil war, as sovereign States, and that those avowals and these acts have produced no war—that the Spanish Minister has affected to consider the taking possession of Amelia, as a direct and flagrant violation of his master's territory, but, instead of making his congé, remains here in his diplomatic character with the most pacific resignation—I cannot persuade myself that his King will go to war for an act, which, I think I have shown, is fully justified by the laws and practice of nations.

On the other hand, the receiving a Minister from the provinces of La Plata seems to me to be required by a just sense of our dignity and station among the nations of the earth, so soon as the Executive shall receive, through their commissioners, unquestionable evidence of their independent situation. It will be required by an impartial and dignified neutrality. A neutrality of that description cannot be said to be maintained while we have at our Government a Spanish Minister, possessed of all the honors, and dignities, and respect, and immunities of the Ministerial character; and while the agent of the republican provinces of South America is not recognised as the representative of a sovereign Power, but resides here unnoticed, in the humble obscurity of a private individual. Sir, I have before said, that I approved the omission to acknowledge him heretofore, because it was in its nature, an act of some moment, and in which there should be something of correspondence in the views of the different departments of the Government. But I would pass this resolution, that a state of things might no longer exist, which cannot but grate upon all our feelings.

Mr. Chairman, I conceive the present question to be of infinite importance. Whether it was desirable that this amendment should have been proposed or not, the rejection of it now will be attended with the most important and unfortunate results. It will give to the public mind an impression most unfavorable to the patriot cause, which gentleman may, at a future period, in vain attempt to eradicate. It will convey to the Executive an opinion that this House is averse to the establishment of a regular intercourse, by Ministers, with these struggling nations. But, above all, it will convey to them an impression, that we are hostile to their cause. It may lead to acts of unfriendliness and hostility, and we shall probably find ourselves, in a few years, open enemies with those to whom we ought to be as friends.

If, on the contrary, we adopt the proposition, we command nothing—we leave everything to the control of Executive discretion; but we intimate in a Constitutional way, to the Executive branch of the Government, the willingness of the Representative body that a friendly intercourse should be established with the nations who are struggling for their independence against the most hateful tyranny of the world. We give an assurance to the unhappy patriots of the sympathies of our nation, and we cultivate in our States that generous interest in the cause of the oppressed which it is not less to the interest than it is to the honor of a Republic to cherish with the most fostering care.

Mr. H. NELSON, of Virginia, said he should not have addressed the Committee on this occasion, if the arguments by which the proposition before the House were supported had been of that harmless nature which the gentleman from Kentucky had claimed for the motion itself. But, said Mr. N., when it is supported with an earnestness and perseverance its avowed object does not warrant; when the Committee and the nation are told that they who advocate the proposition are the friends of freedom, and they who oppose it are its enemies, it is time for us, every fibre in whose hearts beats in unison with the cause of liberty, to enter into the discussion. But, sir, when I see more, that out of this proposition is to grow a division of the Republican party; that on the one side are to be rallied the exclusive friends of liberty, and those on the other side are to be denounced as inimical to it, I confess I am not willing that my political course, or that of the friends with whom I act, should be subjected to such misrepresentation.

The proposition is to make an appropriation to defray the expense of the outfit and a year's salary of a Minister to Buenos Ayres. It is in phraseology a simple proposition, which, on its mere recital, would seem to involve no great principle, to draw after it no important consequence. Yet, how, Mr. N. asked, was that proposition supported? Some gentlemen say this measure is in conformity with the views of the Executive, and they will vote for it because it is so. Other gentlemen advocate it, not because it is in conformity with the views of the Executive, but because the conduct of the Executive, in other cases, as well as this, has not been conformable with their views. It was thus seen that the proposition was supported on different and directly opposite grounds. My honorable colleague, said he, tells us of Executive influence; that, though no one can describe it, it is felt by all. Why these reflections on Executive influence? Has the topic been introduced by those who are opposed to this measure? No; they have contended that it is not the province of this House, unless in extreme cases, to interfere with a diplomatic question; to which it is replied that it is not an interference, but, if it be so, it is in conformity with the views of the Executive. From the report of the Secretary of State, recently laid before the House, it was obviously to be inferred that the Executive would have treated with the Minister who had presented himself from that country, if he had deemed it expedient, and that Minister had the necessary powers. Would the views of the Executive be changed by the adoption of a proposition of this sort? No, Mr. N. said; but the whole course of the Executive may be scrutinized in the discussion of it; and the gentlemen who proposed and supported it, demonstrated, by their arguments, their belief that the Executive wanted goading on the subject, because he had not received a Minister from La Plata. From what source, Mr. N. asked, have we the information that the Government of La Plata desires us to recognise her? Monsieur Aguirre could produce no powers authorizing him to treat; nay, more, it was known that Thompson, the former agent, had been recalled because he had impudently, and without authority, demanded to be recognised as a Minister. Where, then, was the necessity or even propriety, on our part, of thus gratuitously stepping forth and forcing on these Governments our recognition of their independence? Would it not be time enough to do so, when they had shown a disposition to accept our aid? Why should this House step forward, as proposed, merely to apprise the Executive that it does possess a power to send a Minister to Buenos Ayres? The President and Senate had not deemed it expedient to send a Minister, and this House was therefore asked to take upon it the administration of the Executive powers. The object of the proposition could not be veiled; it was plain, obvious, palpable; when this House tells the Executive it appropriates money for the purpose of sending a Minister, it is saying to the Executive we think it your duty to send that Minister. The idea, then, could not be sustained, that this was merely an intimation that, if such a step was taken, the Legislature would sanction it. Could it be fairly presumed that this House would not have appropriated money for the support of such an embassy? If the nation be so solicitous, as gentlemen contend, for the recognition of the independence of the South, and the President similarly disposed; if there be but one sentiment throughout the country respecting the subject, where was the necessity of saying in advance to the President, we will support you in the exercise of your Constitutional powers? There being no such occasion, it was an interference with the Executive authority; it was doing that which is not usual, and which is not consistent with the spirit of the Constitution, notwithstanding the cases of petty Indian treaties, &c., which gentlemen affected to consider as precedent in point. In regard to this great question of the recognition of the independence of a nation, how stood precedent? When WASHINGTON saw cause to recognise the independence of France, did he wait for the sanction of Congress to judge whether or not he ought to receive a Minister from that Government? He did not. In every view the course proposed was not reconcilable with the usages of the country; and because it was not, and in his opinion transcended the Constitutional powers of Congress, he was unwilling, on great principles, to adopt this measure.

Mr. N. said he had remarked, in the opening of his speech, that he would not have troubled the House on this occasion, but for the suggestion that the opponents of this motion were not the friends of freedom. I boast, myself, said he, as much the friend of freedom as any man created. When that cause is on the tapis, I am not lukewarm. If by my fiat liberty could be granted to all the people on the globe, it should be done, and the welkin should resound with their cries of joy. I am not, therefore, averse to the success of the advocates of freedom in South America; so far from feeling apathy in respect to it, I trust in Heaven their arms will be successful; that they will achieve and maintain their independence.

Mr. N. said he had expected, when the Speaker introduced this great and important proposition—for such the gentlemen had made it, by showing it to be such in his estimation, and its importance was not to be frittered away by arguments going to show that it meant nothing more than a mere declaration of assent to the execution of a Constitutional power by the President of the United States—he had expected, he said, to have heard the Speaker examine one question, on which the expediency of adopting his proposition wholly depended, but which he had entirely overlooked: what good would result to the people of South America from this act? Were the people of South America competent to maintain their independence? I trust in God, said Mr. N., they are. If they are, your recognition of their independence affords them no benefit. If they are not competent to maintain it, of what avail will be your recognition? Will it give strength to the arm of the nerveless, or animate the sluggish? It can work no such salutary effect. If the people of South America are incompetent to maintain their independence, their recognition by the United States will not confer the ability. But, said Mr. N., will you, if you recognise this nation, refuse to go to war, if necessary, to support that recognition? The American nation will never be guilty of such perfidy. The Speaker says he is not now the advocate of a war with Spain; but, I cannot believe, sir, that when we have embarked in the cause of the patriots, by sending them a Minister, if we find them sinking beneath the weight of the chains of oppression, that the Speaker would sit quietly in his place, and see that liberty which he says they have for ten years enjoyed, wrested from them. No, sir; if we take one step which has the effect to render us an ally of the Southern countries at war with Spain, we cannot stop short of a war in their behalf. For, though I love peace, and believe that we can never go to war without jeopardizing some important principle, I would yet hazard that, having advanced so far as is now proposed, rather than see the liberty of eighteen millions of people once recognised, destroyed without an effort to preserve it. The affording them aid by arms, if necessary, will be the unavoidable consequence of taking this step.

If we give no strength to the cause of the patriots by the proposed recognition; if a war with Spain is not to follow in its train, where is the necessity of the step? Admit that it be not pregnant with the evil consequences to our own country, contended for by some, and admitted by others to be possible at least, where is the advantage or propriety of legislating without any possible prospect of doing good to ourselves or others?

But one gentleman has said, we have already recognised the independence of the provinces of La Plata, because we have admitted their flag into our ports, and because we have reclaimed property seized under the blockade of their ports by Old Spain. If this argument prove anything as to us, what does it prove as to Spain herself? If we have recognised the independence of the provinces by reclaiming property captured under the illegal blockade of them by Spain, what has Spain done by instituting that blockade? As long as the provinces belonged to Spain, she had a right to restrain their commerce by law; but, instead of so doing, she has declared a blockade of their ports, and it was not usual, certainly, for a nation to declare a blockade of its own ports. If, therefore, the gentleman had succeeded in proving by his argument, that we have already recognised the independence of La Plata, he has by the same argument, established, what is much more important, that Spain herself has recognised their independence, and of course absolved them from their allegiance. I think, however, my colleague failed in his argument. He has not proved that the act to which he refers is a recognition of independence, any more than he has proved that treating with a private agent of a Government, is equivalent to receiving a public Minister. How has Mr. Aguirre been received? He has sent a communication, and has received an answer. And Don Pazos too—he, finding that the Executive would not treat with him, comes to Congress and some gentleman advocated his having an audience here. At one moment the President is charged with hostility to the patriots for rejecting Don Pazos, and at another it is contended that the merely receiving a letter from a man announcing himself as a foreign agent is a recognition of the independence of the country which he professes to represent. How are we to decide amidst such a discord of arguments, the one of which conflicts the other? The truth is, that neither of the persons referred to has been recognised in any other than his individual capacity.

But what is more afflicting, said Mr. N., to my feelings, is the charge of hostility to liberty. It is said, that we are afraid of Spain!—What means this? Are the scenes through which we have recently passed already to be set down as a tale of the times of old? Is the stale charge of foreign influence so soon to be disinterred? A few short years ago, one party in our country could not take a step but the Emperor of France had dictated it, whilst for all its acts the motives of the opposite party were referred to attachment to the King of Great Britain. Shall this species of conflict be now revived? Shall we never be allowed in our deliberations to consult American interests only? Is our country to be forever torn into parties by imputations of foreign feelings? I have no objection, sir, to a division of parties, if gentlemen see proper—but let us hear no more of foreign partialities, or of subservience to foreign power. The gentleman from Louisiana conjures us up another spectre, the fear of Great Britain—advances to the field with gallant helm and hauberk, and fights until he beats it down. The gentleman from Massachusetts, in a different way, brings forward and defeats another spectre, its twin brother, if not the same. Both the gentlemen, the one in armor dight, the other in the buskin clad, encounter the same goblin with equal reason and with like success. Sir, I would not rush madly into war; but I would not have fear pervade the public councils, where, it is said, and truly said, that fear betrays like treason. We, however, are afraid of Great Britain! and we are afraid of Spain—and we are the foes of liberty! In this light do gentlemen exhibit us to the world, whilst they are the exclusive friends to liberty. It is not on the side of France and England, then, it seems, as in old times, that parties are now to be arrayed; but one on the side of Old Spain, and the other on the side of the patriots. Sir, we are either afraid of, or devoted to Spain. Poor enfeebled monarchy! If, as gentlemen contend, its treasury is empty, and its power diminishing, the influence which they affect to deprecate will not last long. But it will last long enough to do this—to divide the country into factions; and we who, side by side with the advocates of this motion, have been contending against domestic factions and foreign enemies, are to be denounced as the enemies of liberty, and they to be held up as its exclusive advocates, though I deny them their title, and will contest with them the right to it. The President, too, is to be on our side. Very good company, said Mr. N., and I have no objection to it; he has, no doubt, equally with us deserved to be denounced as the foe of liberty. Did he not toil with us in the late contest? Did he not, at the age of eighteen, long before many of us saw the light, wield the sword in his country's service? And has not every act of his life, at home and abroad, proved him the friend of liberty and free government? Why, then, said Mr. N., are he and we to be denounced as the enemies of liberty? I do regret this debate, because I view it as the epoch of a division of the old Republican party. We are to be rent in twain, and one moiety of it is to be arrayed against the other. Those with whom I act are, it appears, to contend against the old disgusting tale of foreign influence. Such a division, as he anticipated, Mr. N. said, was an evil not to be condemned, but which every one belonging to the party must feel and deprecate. It would be to each one arrayed in the opposing ranks, a conflict against a brother, against an approved and tried friend. In a cause where the best interests of the country were in jeopardy, said Mr. N., we have been tried together against the strongest foe. Yes; the brothers and friends, who have thus fought side by side, are to be now divided; for what? Do we essentially differ in our avowed objects? Not at all. Are we, who cannot assent to this motion, opposed to the independence of La Plata? Are we unwilling that the people of South America should shake off the yoke of Spain? No, we are not. But this feeling which comes from abroad to divide us, is, for reasons not to be penetrated, to destroy that harmony of which we had so fair a prospect.

Mr. N. said that he had already stated that, if the provinces of La Plata were competent to maintain their independence, this Government could give them no aid of any importance to them; which aid, therefore, those provinces did not want. Could not those provinces, he asked, effect their independence without the interference of the United States? Gentlemen had informed the House that the population of the provinces was larger than our own at the present day. The population of those provinces, too, gentlemen had told the House, was greater than that of the mother country. And if Spain is not competent to protect the skirt of territory she holds adjoining our southern boundary, nor to suppress the opposition to her authority which has for seven years existed in the South; if she be thus crippled, what difficulty can there be in maintaining the independence of the provinces, those of La Plata for instance, which have not a single European soldier to contend with. Where is the necessity of our volunteering, without reason and without motive, to perform an act which may, by possibility, terminate in war with some foreign Power? Certainly it cannot be shown. And what is the particular act it is proposed that we should do? Send a Minister to the Provinces of La Plata, it is said. Have they, asked Mr. N., invited you to send a Minister to them? Have they sent one of their own? So far from it, have they not punished one of their agents who asked to be received as a Minister? Why, then, this precipitancy?

But, it had been said, that the President, though not at this moment disposed formally to recognise the independence of these provinces, might change that disposition, and be willing, during the recess, to send a Minister to Buenos Ayres. Suppose that the fact should occur; that the President, by the advice of his Cabinet, should change his disposition, on receiving information, from our Commissioners, such as would justify it. The disposition to receive their Minister and return the compliment, may be made known to the agent here, and even the Minister might be appointed and sent without the intervention of Congress.

Suppose we adopt this proposition, send a Minister to the provinces of La Plata, and make a treaty of commerce with them. Spain, whose right of blockade, with an efficient force, has not been denied, blockades the ports of the provinces, over which she still claims sovereignty, and captures our vessels. Will the Speaker, then, consent to wait a little longer for the settlement of our differences with Spain? No: he would feel more indignation than he manifested on the occasion of the reply of the late Secretary of State to the Minister of Spain. If you attempt to enter those ports by a resistance of the blockade, to war you must go: you can no longer negotiate, but must sustain your rights by force of arms. If you negotiate a treaty of commerce with those Powers, and Spain dares to interrupt your exercise of the rights established by that treaty, you must support, by war, the position you have taken.

However humble may be the importance of this proposition in an abstract view, the adoption of it must necessarily terminate in a war with Spain. Like the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, I too, said Mr. N., am indisposed to calculate on the imbecility of a nation, as inferred from the mismanagement of its resources. Besides, sir, how does it comport with the magnanimity which becomes the advocates of liberty, to do an act, which they would not otherwise do, because Spain is not in a condition to resent it? Will we trample, still lower in the dust, the Power which, by accident, is reduced so low? Such a policy does not comport with that magnanimity which has distinguished the councils of this nation, from the commencement of this Government to the present day. What, sir, was the charge advanced against us when we made war with England? That we took advantage of her situation, pressed by France and surrounded by enemies. And how indignantly did we rebut the charge! The Speaker, among others, repelled and spurned the charge thus made by the foes of the Government. Abstracted from the consideration that we may be mistaken in our calculation on the poverty of the resources of Spain, and that she may rise to an eminence which we do not foresee, I will not, because the Spanish Government is depressed, because her treasury is exhausted, do an act which I would not do to her in a different situation, or to any Power on earth. Spain has given us just cause for war; but, if that is to be our policy, let us go directly to our object, and take Florida and Cuba.

H. or R.

Spanish American Provinces.

MARCH, 1818.

Although, said Mr. N., as I have suggested, the most injurious consequences might flow from the adoption of the proposition before the House, under the views which I have taken of it, I would yet hesitate in the rejection of it, if there was even a remote probability of its producing good consequences. But I believe it will have no such effect; that it will not strengthen the hands of the colonies to do any act which they are not already capable of performing. Nor can it produce any beneficial change in the commercial relations between us and them. Have we not already a free commerce with them? They want not men; for they have even more than we. They want munitions and implements of war. Have they not, for this purpose, ample access to our markets; and is not their flag protected within our ports? They already enjoy a free commerce with us in all the articles important to them; and they would not have any more if they had a Minister resident here. Will gentlemen condescend to substitute plain fact for lofty declamation, and show me what practical advantages are to accrue to either party, from the interchange of Ministers? This is the true question at issue: and, although we have been delighted, amused, and instructed, by the eloquence, the enthusiasm, and the historical and commercial facts of the mover of the proposition before us; yet, after all, the honorable Speaker did not, in his whole argument, touch the point on which this question turns. If any great advantage were to result to the independents from the adoption of the motion, I should be brought to pause in my determination. I put self out of the question; I will not examine the advantages which would result to this country from an intercourse with the provinces—neither, if we enjoy more advantages from that commerce now than if they were recognised, that argument would not affect my vote—I will not examine the question as connected with our commercial interests; but I wish gentlemen who advocate this proposition to show us what advantages are to result to the provinces from a similar recognition, in form, of their independence. This very day has information been received, which will destroy much of our hopes, and many of the arguments in favor of this proposition. It was but the other day Pueyrredon was put down, and some other one put up in his place; and not a gentleman here can tell us what is the actual condition of these provinces. Those who were free yesterday may be subjugated to-day, and freed again to-morrow. The Government has sent our Commissioners expressly charged to ascertain the state of the country. Why, then, this haste to anticipate a deliberate decision by the Constitutional organ of intercourse with foreign Powers? Before the next meeting of Congress, the actual state of things will be satisfactorily ascertained, and the President will be enabled, without our meddling or interference, to send a Minister or receive one, if he shall find it expedient. But perhaps the Speaker will equally object to that delay, as he has done to waiting a little longer for a settlement with Spain. I am for refraining, in both cases until we can act in a manner consistent with the public interest, and with our political duties and obligations.

In fine, Mr. N. said, although he was disposed to do everything which would promote the cause of liberty, whether in the frozen regions of the North, or under the scorching influence of a tropical sun, he was at present in favor of standing still, in the position we now occupy, and patiently waiting until we know the actual situation of the country proposed to be visited by a Minister from us; he was in favor of waiting, until the President acts in such a manner as to make it necessary for this House to goad him on in the performance of his duty.

When Mr. N. had concluded, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

SATURDAY, March 28.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Richard Bland Lee, Commissioner of Claims, transmitting reports of the facts in the cases of Jacob B. Gilbert, and Asa Fuller, of the State of New York, with the evidence accompanying each; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion of Mr. RHEA, the Message of the President of the United States, of the 18th of January, 1816, recommending the confirmation of certain grants or reservations of land, made by the friendly Creek Indians, to Major General Jackson, Benjamin Hawkins, and others, were referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. RHEA, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill making provision for the claim of M. Poirey, as Secretary and Aid-de-Camp to Major General La Fayette; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of Michael Hogan; An act for the relief of John G. Bogert; and, An act to increase the salaries of certain officers of Government; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The said bills were, severally, read twice, and the two former referred to the Committee of Claims, and the latter to the Committee of Ways and Means.

An engrossed "Resolution directing the printing and distribution of the act to provide for the surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary army," was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act concerning the Territory of Alabama," was read the third time, and passed.

SPANISH AMERICAN PROVINCES.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the general appropriation bill, Mr. CLAY's amendment, going to make an appropriation for the outfit and year's salary of a Minister to Buenos Ayres, still pending.

Mr. CLAY said that, as no other gentleman appeared disposed to address the Chair, he would avail himself of this opportunity of making some remarks in reply to the opponents of his motion.

The first objection which he thought it incumbent on him to notice was that of his friend from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWMEYER,) who opposed the form of the proposition, as being made on a general appropriation bill, on which he appeared to think nothing ought to be ingrafted which was likely to give rise to a difference between the two branches of the Legislature. If the gentleman himself had always acted on this principle, his objection would be entitled to more weight; but, Mr. C. said, the item in the appropriation bill next following this, and reported by the gentleman himself, was infinitely more objectionable—which was an appropriation of thirty thousand dollars for defraying the expenses of three Commissioners, appointed, or proposed to be paid, in an unconstitutional form. It could not be expected that a general appropriation bill would ever pass without some disputable clauses; and in case of a difference between the two Houses, (a difference which we had no right to anticipate in this instance,) which could not be compromised as to any article, the obvious course was to omit such article altogether, retaining all the others; and, in a case of that character, relative to the brevet pay, which had occurred during the present session, such had been the ground the gentleman himself had taken in a conference with the Senate, of which he was a manager.

The gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. C. said, had professed to concur with him in a great many of his general propositions; and neither he nor any other gentleman had disagreed with him, that the mere recognition of the independence of the provinces was no cause of war with Spain; except the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) to whom he recommended, without intending disrespect to him, to confine himself to the operations of commerce, rather than undertake to expound questions of public law; for he could assure the gentleman that, although he might make some figure with his practical knowledge, in the one case, he would not, in the other. No man, Mr. C. said, except the gentleman from Maryland, had come out with what he would call the hardihood to contend that, on the ground of principle and mere public law, the exertion of the right of recognising another Power is cause of war. But, said Mr. C., though the gentleman from South Carolina admitted that the recognition would be no cause of war, and that it was not likely to lead to a war with Spain, we found him shortly after, getting into a war with Spain, how, I did not see, and by some means, which he did not deign to discover to us, getting us into a war with England also. Having satisfied himself, by this course of reasoning, the gentleman had discovered that the finances of Spain were in a most favorable condition! On this part of the subject, Mr. C. said, it was not necessary for him to say anything after what the Committee had heard from the eloquent gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. HOLMES,) whose voice, in a period infinitely more critical in our affairs than the present, had been heard with so much delight from the East, in support of the rights and honor of the country. He had clearly shown that there was no parallel between the state of Spain and of this country; the one, of a country whose resources were completely impoverished and exhausted; the other, of a country whose resources were almost untouched. But, Mr. C. said, he would ask of the gentleman from South Carolina, if he could conceive that a State, in the condition of Spain, whose Minister of the Treasury admits that the people have no longer the means of paying new taxes; a nation with an immense mass of floating debt, and totally without credit, could feel any anxiety to engage in war with a nation like this, whose situation was, in every possible view, directly the reverse? He asked, if an annual revenue, equal only to five-eighths of the annual expenditure, exhibited a financial ability to enter upon a new war, when, too, the situation of Spain was altogether unlike that of the United States and England, whose credit, resting upon a solid basis, enabled them to supply, by loans, any deficit in the income?

Notwithstanding the diversity of sentiment which had been displayed during the debate, Mr. C. was happy to find that, with one exception, every member had done justice to the struggle in the South, and admitted it to be entitled to the favor of the best feelings of the human heart. Even my honorable friend near me, (Mr. NELSON,) has made a speech on our side, and we should not have found out, if he had not told us, that he would vote against us. Although his speech has been distinguished by his accustomed eloquence, I should be glad, Mr. C. said, to agree on a cartel with the gentlemen on the other side of the House, to give them his speech for his vote. The gentleman says his heart is with us, that he ardently desires the independence of the South. Will he excuse me for telling him that, if he will give himself up to the honest feelings of his heart, he will have a much surer guide than by trusting to his head, to which, however, I am far from offering any disparagement?

But, sir, it seems that a division of the Republican party is about to be made by the proposition under consideration. Who is to furnish, in this respect, the correct criterion—whose conduct is to be the standard of orthodoxy? What has been the great principle of the party to which the gentleman from Virginia refers, from the first existence of the Government to the present day? An attachment to liberty; a devotion to the great cause of humanity—of freedom—of self-government—and of equal rights. If there is to be a division, (as the gentleman says)—if he is going to leave us, who are following the old track—he may in his new connexions find a greater variety of company, which perhaps may indemnify him for the loss of his old friends. What is the great principle that has distinguished parties in all ages and under all Governments—Democrats and Federalists, Whigs and Tories, Plebeians and Patricians? The one, distrustful of human nature, appreciates less the influence of reason and of good dispositions, and appeals more to physical force; the other party, confiding in human nature, relies much upon moral power, and applies to force as an auxiliary only to the operations of reason. All the modifications and denominations of political parties and sects may be traced to this fundamental distinction. It is that which separated the two great parties in this country. If there is to be a division in the Republican party, I glory that I, at least, am found among those who are anxious for the advancement of human rights and of human liberty. And the honorable gentleman who spoke of appealing to the public sentiment, will find when he does so, (or I am much mistaken,) that public sentiment is also on the side of public liberty and of human happiness.

But, the gentleman from South Carolina has told us, continued Mr. C., that the Constitution has wisely confided to the Executive branch of the Government the administration of the foreign concerns of the country. Has the honorable gentleman attempted to show, (though his proposition be generally true, and will never be controverted by me,) that we also have not our participation in the administration of the foreign interests of the country, when we are called upon, in our legislative capacity, to defray the expenses of foreign missions, or to regulate commerce? Mr. C. said he had stated, when up before, (and he had listened in vain for an answer to the argument,) that no part of the Constitution had said which should have precedence—the act making an appropriation for paying a Minister, or the act of sending one. He had then contended, and now repeated, that either the acts of deputation and of paying a Minister should be simultaneous, or (if either had preference) the act of appropriating for his pay should precede the sending of a Minister. He challenged gentlemen to show him anything in the Constitution which directed that a Minister should be sent before his payment was provided for. He repeated what he had said the other day, that by sending a Minister abroad during the recess, to nations between whom and us no such relations existed as to justify incurring the expense, the legislative opinion was forestalled or unduly biased. He appealed to the practice of the Government, and referred to various acts of Congress, for cases of appropriations without the previous deputation of the agent abroad, and without the preliminary of a Message from the President asking for them. Mr. C. here quoted the act authorizing the establishment of certain consulates in the Mediterranean, and affixing salaries thereto, in consequence of which the President had subsequently appointed Consuls, who had been receiving their salaries to this day. Other acts he quoted, of a similar character, from which it appeared, he said, that Congress had constantly pursued the great principle of the theory of the Constitution, for which he now contended; that each department of the Government must act within its own sphere, independently, and on its own responsibility. It was a little extraordinary, indeed, after the doctrine which had been maintained the other day, of a sweeping right in Congress to appropriate money to any object, that it should now be contended that Congress had no right to appropriate money to a particular object. The gentleman's (Mr. Lowndes) doctrine was broad—comprehending every case—but, when proposed to be exemplified in any specific case, it did not apply. Mr. C. said, his theory of the Constitution on this particular subject, was, that Congress had the right of appropriating money for foreign missions—the President the power to use it. The President having the power, he was willing to say to him, Here is the money (which we alone have a right to appropriate) which will enable you to carry your power into effect, if it seems expedient to you. Both being before him—the power and the means of executing it, the President would judge, on his own responsibility, whether or not it was expedient to exercise it. In this course, Mr. C. said, each department of the Government would act independently, without influence from, and without interference with, each other. He had quoted cases from the statute book to show, that in instances where no foreign agent had been appointed, but only a possibility of their being appointed, appropriations had been made for paying them. He proceeded to show, that, even in case of the subject-matter of a negotiation—a right much more important than that of sending an agent—an appropriation of money had preceded the negotiation of a treaty. Thus, in the third volume of the new edition of the laws, page 27, he quoted a case of an appropriation of twenty-five thousand eight hundred and eighty dollars to defray the expense of such treaties as the President of the United States might deem proper to make with certain Indian tribes. An act, which had been lately referred to, appropriating two millions for the purchase of the Floridas, was a case still more strongly in point, as contemplating a treaty, not with a savage, but a civilized Power. In this case there might have been (though he believed there was not) an Executive Message, recommending the appropriation; but he took upon himself to assert, that in almost all the cases he had quoted, there was no previous Executive intimation that the appropriation of the money was necessary to the object. But Congress had taken up the subjects, and authorized these appropriations, without any official call from the Executive to do so.

With regard to the general condition of the provinces now in revolt against the parent country, Mr. C. proceeded to say, he would not take up much of the time of the House. Gentlemen were, however, much mistaken as to many of the points of their history, geography, commerce, and produce, which had been touched upon. Gentlemen had supposed there would be from those countries a considerable competition of the same products which we export. Mr. C. ventured to say, that, in regard to Mexico, there could be no such competition; that the table lands were at such a distance from the seashore, and the difficulty of reaching it was so great as to make the transportation to La Vera Cruz too expensive to be borne, and the heat so intense as to destroy the breadstuffs as soon as they arrive. With respect to New Grenada, the gentleman from Maryland was entirely mistaken. It was the elevation of Mexico, principally, which enabled it to produce breadstuffs; but New Grenada, lying nearly under the line, could not produce them. The productions of New Grenada for exportation were the precious metals, (of which, of gold particularly, a greater portion was to be found than in any of the provinces except Mexico,) sugar, coffee, cocoa, and some other articles of a similar character. Of Venezuela the principal productions were coffee, cocoa, indigo, and some sugar. Sugar was also produced in all the Guianas, French, Spanish, and Dutch. The interior of the provinces of La Plata might be productive of breadstuffs, but they were too remote to come into competition with us in the West India market, the voyages to the United States generally occupying from fifty to sixty days, and sometimes as long as ninety days. By deducting from that number the average passage from the United States to the West Indies, the length of the usual passage between Buenos Ayres and the West Indies would be found, and would show that, in the supply of the West India market with breadstuffs, the provinces could never come seriously into competition with us. And, with regard to Chili, productive as it might be, did the gentleman from Maryland suppose that vessels were going to double Cape Horn, and come into competition with us in the West Indies? It was impossible. But, Mr. C. said, he felt a reluctance at pursuing the discussion of this part of the question; because he was sure these were considerations on which the House could not act, being entirely unworthy of the subject. We might as well stop all our intercourse with England, with France, or with the Baltic, whose products are in many respects the same as ours, as to act on the present occasion under the influence of any such considerations. It was too selfish, too mean a principle, for this body to act on, to refuse its sympathy for the patriots of the South, because some little advantage of a commercial nature might be retained to us from their remaining in the present condition—which, however, he totally denied. Three-fourths of the productions of the Spanish provinces were the precious metals, and the greater part of the residue not of the same character as the staple productions of our soil. But, it seemed, that a pamphlet had recently been published on this subject, to which gentlemen had referred. Now, said Mr. C., permit me to express a distrust of all pamphlets of this kind, unless we know their source. It may, for aught I know, if not composed at the instance of the Spanish Minister, have been written by some merchant who has a privilege of trading to Lima under royal license; for such do exist, as I am informed, and some of them procured under the agency of a celebrated person by the name of Samiento, of whom, perhaps, the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Smith) could give the House some information. To gentlemen thus privileged to trade with the Spanish provinces under royal authority, the effect of a recognition of the independence of the provinces would be to deprive them of that monopoly. The reputed author of the pamphlet in question, Mr. C. said, if he understood correctly, was one who had been, if he were not now, deeply engaged in the trade, and he would venture to say that many of his statements were incorrect. In relation to the trade of Mexico, Mr. C. said he happened to possess the Royal Gazette of Mexico of 1804, showing what was the trade of that province in 1803; from which it appeared that, without making allowance for the trade from the Philippine Islands to Acapulco, the imports into the port of Vera Cruz were in that year twenty-two millions in value, exclusive of contraband, the amount of which was very considerable. Among these articles were many which the United States could supply as well, if not on better terms, than they could be supplied from any other quarter; for example, brandy and spirits; paper, iron, implements for agriculture, and the mines; wax, spices, naval stores, salt fish, butter, provisions; these articles amounting in the whole to one-seventh part of the whole import trade to Mexico. With regard to the independence of that country, which gentlemen seemed to think improbable, Mr. C. rejoiced that he was able to congratulate the House that we have, this morning, intelligence that Mina yet lives, and the patriot flag is still unfurled, and the cause infinitely more prosperous than ever. This intelligence he was much in hopes would prove true, notwithstanding the particular accounts of his death; which, there was so much fabrication and falsehood in the Spanish practice, were not entitled to credit unless corroborated by other information. Articles were manufactured in one province to produce effect on the other provinces and in this country; and he had therefore always been disposed to think that the details respecting the capture and execution of Mina were too minute to be true, and were made up to produce an effect here.

With regard to the general value of the trade of a country, Mr. C. said, it is to be determined by the quantum of its population, and its character, its productions, and the extent and character of the territory; and, applying these criteria to Spanish America, no nation offered higher inducements to commercial enterprise. Washed on the one side by the Pacific, on the other by the South Atlantic; standing between Africa and Europe on the one hand, and Asia on the other, lying along side of the United States, her commerce must, when free from the restraints of despotism, be immensely important, particularly when it is recollected how great a proportion of the precious metals it produced, for that nation which can command the precious metals, may be said to command almost the resources of the world. One moment, said Mr. C., imagine the mines of the South locked up from Great Britain for two years, what would be the effect on her paper system? Bankruptcy, explosion, revolution. Even if the supply which we get abroad of the precious metals was cut off for any length of time, I ask if the effect on our paper system would not be, not perhaps equally as fatal as to England, yet one of the greatest calamities which could befall this country. The revenue of Spain in Mexico alone, was, in 1809, twenty millions of dollars, and in the other provinces in about the same proportion, taking into view their population, independent of the immense contributions annually paid to the clergy. When you look at the resources of the country, and the extent of its population, recollecting that it is double our own; that its consumption of foreign articles, under a free commerce, would be proportionally great; that it yields a large revenue under the most abominable system, under which nearly three-fourths of the population are unclad, and almost as naked as from the hands of nature, because absolutely deprived of the means of clothing themselves; what may not be the effect on this country, under the operation of a different system which would let industry develop its resources in all possible forms? Such a neighbor could not but be a valuable acquisition in a commercial point of view.

Gentlemen had denied the fact of the existence of the independence of Buenos Ayres at as early a date as he had assigned to it. The gentleman from South Carolina, who was well informed on the subject, did not, Mr. C. thought, exhibit his usual candor on this part of it. When the gentleman talked of the upper provinces being out of the possession of the patriots as late as 1815, he ought to have gone back and told the House what was the actual state of the fact, with which he was sure the gentleman was very well acquainted. In 1811 the Government of Buenos Ayres had been in possession of every spot of the territory of the Viceroyalty. The war had been raging from 1811 to 1815 in those interior provinces, bordering on Lima, which had been as often as three times conquered by the enemy, and as often recovered, and from which the enemy was now finally expelled. Was this at all remarkable during the progress of such a revolution? During the different periods of our war of independence, the British had possession of different parts of our country; as late as 1780, the whole of the Southern States had been in their possession; and at an earlier date they had possession of the great Northern capitals. There was, in regard to Buenos Ayres, a distinguishing trait, which did not exist in the history of our Revolution. That was, that from 1810 to the present day the capital of the Republic of La Plata had been invariably in the possession of the patriot Government. Gentlemen must admit that when, in 1814, she captured at Montevideo an army as large as Burgoyne's, captured at Saratoga, they were then in possession of independence. If they have been since 1810 in the enjoyment of self-government, it was, indeed, not very material under what name or under what form. The fact of their independence is all that is necessary to be established. In reply to the argument of the gentleman from South Carolina, derived from his having been unable to find out the number of the provinces, this arose from the circumstance that, thirty-six years ago, the Viceroyalty had been a Captain-Generalship; that it extended then only to Tucuman, while of late and at present the Government extended to the Desaguadara, in about the sixteenth degree of south latitude. There were other reasons why there was some confusion in the number of the provinces, as stated by different writers; there was, in the first place, a territorial division of the country—then a judicial, and next a military division, and the provinces have been stated at ten, thirteen, or twenty, according to the denominations used. This, however, he, with the gentleman from South Carolina, regarded as a fact of no sort of consequence.

Mr. C. said he would pass over the report lately made to the House by the Department of State, respecting the state of South America, with only one remark: that it appeared to him to exhibit evidence of an adroit and experienced diplomatist negotiating, or rather conferring on a subject, with a young and inexperienced Minister, from a young and inexperienced Republic. From the manner in which this report was communicated, after a call for information so long made, and after the lapse of two months from the last date in the correspondence on the subject, Mr. C. declared he was mortified at hearing the report read. Why talk of the mode of recognition? Why make objections to the form of the commission? If the Minister had not a formal power, why not tell him to send back for one? Why ask of him to enumerate the particular States whose independence he wished acknowledged? Suppose the French Minister had asked of Franklin what number of States he represented? Thirteen, if you please, Franklin would have replied. But, M. Franklin, will you tell me if Pennsylvania, whose capital is in possession of the British, be one of them? What would Dr. Franklin have said? Mr. C. said it would have comported better with the frankness of the American character, and of American diplomacy, if the Secretary, avoiding cavils about the form of the commission, had said to the Minister of Buenos Ayres, "at the present moment we do not intend to recognise you, or to receive or send a Minister to you."

But among the charges which gentlemen had industriously brought together, the House had been told of factions prevailing in Buenos Ayres. Do not factions, Mr. C. asked, exist everywhere? Are they not to be found in the best regulated and most firmly established Governments? Respecting the Carreras, public information was abused, Mr. C. said; they were supposed to have had improper views, designs hostile to the existing Government, and it became necessary to deprive them of the power of doing mischief. And what was the fact respecting the alleged arrest of American citizens?—Buenos Ayres had been organizing an army to attack Chili. Carrera arrives at the river La Plata with some North Americans; he had before defeated the revolution in Chili by withholding his co-operation; the Government of Buenos Ayres, therefore, said to him, we do not want your resources; our own army is operating; if you carry yours there it may produce dissension, and cause the loss of liberty—you shall not go. On his opposing this course, what was done which has called forth the sympathy of gentlemen? He and those who attended him from this country were put in confinement, but only long enough to permit the operations of the Buenos Ayrean army to go on; they were then permitted to go, or made their escape, to Montevideo, and afterwards, where they pleased. With respect to the conduct of that Government, he would only recall the attention of gentlemen to the orders which had lately emanated from it for the regulation of privateers, which had displayed a solicitude to guard against irregularity, and to respect the rights of neutrals, not inferior to that ever shown by any Government which had ever attempted to regulate this licentious mode of warfare.

The honorable gentleman from Georgia had commenced his remarks the other day by an animadversion which, Mr. C. said, he might well have spared, when he told us that even the prayers of the Chaplain of this House had been offered up in behalf of the patriots. And was it reprehensible, Mr. C. asked, that an American chaplain, whose cheeks were furrowed by age, and his head as white as snow, who had a thousand times, during our own Revolution, implored the smiles of Heaven on our exertions, should indulge in the pious and patriotic feelings flowing from his recollections of our own Revolution? Ought he to be subject to animadversion for so doing, in a place where he could not be heard in reply? Ought he to be subject to animadversion for soliciting the favor of Heaven on the same cause as that in which we fought the good fight, and conquered our independence? He trusted not.

But the gentleman from Georgia, it appeared, could see no parallel between our Revolution and that of the Spanish provinces. Their revolution, in its commencement, did not aim at complete independence; neither, Mr. C. said, did ours. Such was the loyalty of the Creole character, that, although groaning under three hundred years of tyranny and oppression, they had been unwilling to cast off their allegiance to that Throne, which had been the Throne of their ancestors. But, looking forward to a redress of wrongs, rather than a change of Government, they gradually, and perhaps at first unintentionally, entered into revolution. Mr. C. said he had it from those who had been actively engaged in our Revolution; from that venerable man, (Chancellor Wythe,) whose memory he should ever cherish with filial regard, that a very short time before our Declaration of Independence, it would have been impossible to have got a majority of Congress to declare it. Look at the language of our petitions of that day, carrying our loyalty to the foot of the Throne, and avowing our anxiety to remain under the Crown of our ancestors; independence was then not even remotely suggested as our object. The present state of facts, and not what has passed and gone in South America, must be consulted. At the present moment, the patriots of the South are fighting for liberty and independence—for precisely what we fought for. But their revolution, the gentleman told the House, was stained by scenes which had not occurred in ours. If so, Mr. C. said, it was because execrable outrages had been committed upon them by the troops of the mother country, which were not upon us. Could it be believed, if the slaves had been let loose upon us in the South, as they had been let loose in Venezuela; if quarters had been refused; capitulations violated; that General WASHINGTON, at the head of the armies of the United States, would not have resorted to retribution? Retaliation is sometimes mercy; mercy to both parties. The only means by which the coward soul that indulges in such enormities can be reached, is to show to him that they will be visited by severe but just retribution. There were traits in the history of this revolution, Mr. C. said, which showed what deep root liberty had taken in South America. He stated an instance. The only hope of a wealthy and reputable family, said he, was charged, at the head of a small force, with the care of the magazine of the army. He saw that it was impossible to defend it. "Go," said he to his companions in arms, "I alone am sufficient for its defence." The assailants approached; he applied a match and blew up the magazine, with himself, scattering death and destruction on his enemy. Mr. C. narrated another instance of the intrepidity of a female of the patriot party. A lady in New Grenada had given information to the patriot forces of plans and instructions by which the capital might be invaded. She was put upon the rack to divulge her accomplices. She bore the torture with the greatest fortitude, and died exclaiming—"You shall not hear it from my mouth; I will die, and may those live who can free my country."

But the House had been told, and told with a triumph worthy of a better cause—why recognise this Republic? Where is the use of it? And was it possible, Mr. C. asked, that gentlemen could see no use in recognising this Republic? For what did the Republic fight? To be admitted into the family of nations. Tell the nations of the world, says Pueyrredon in his speech, that we already belong to their illustrious rank. What would be the powerful consequences of a recognition of their claim? I ask my honorable friend before me (Mr. BLOOMFIELD,) the high sanction of whose judgment in favor of my proposition I fondly anticipate, with what anxious solicitude, during our Revolution, he and his glorious compatriots turned their eyes to Europe, and asked to be recognised. I ask him, the patriot of '76, how the heart rebounded with joy, on the information that France had recognised us! The moral influence of such a recognition on the patriot of the South will be irresistible. He will derive assurance from it of his not having fought in vain. In the constitution of our natures, there is a point to which adversity may pursue us, without perhaps any worse effect than that of exciting new energy to meet it. Having reached that point, if no gleam of comfort breaks through the gloom, we sink beneath the pressure, yielding reluctantly to our fate, and in hopeless despair losing all stimulus to exertion. And, Mr. C. asked, was there not reason to fear such a fate to the patriots of La Plata? Already enjoying independence for eight years, their Ministers were yet spurned from the Courts of Europe, and rejected by the Government of a sister Republic. Contrast this conduct of ours, said Mr. C. with our conduct in other respects. No matter whence the Minister comes, be it from a despotic Power, we receive him; and even now, the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) would have us send a Minister to Constantinople, to beg passage through the Dardanelles to the Black Sea, that, I suppose, we might get some hemp and breadstuffs there, of which we ourselves produce none—he who can see no advantage to the country from opening to its commerce the nameless resources of South America, would send a Minister begging to Constantinople for a little trade! Nay, I have seen a project in the newspapers, and I should not be surprised, after what we have already seen, at its being carried into effect, for sending a Minister to the Porte. Yes, sir, from Constantinople or from the Brazils; from Turk or Christian; from black or white; from the Bey of Algiers or the Bey of Tunis—from the Devil himself, if he wore a crown, we should receive a Minister. We even paid the expenses of the Minister of his Sublime Highness the Bey of Tunis, and thought ourselves highly honored by his visit. But, let the Minister come from a poor Republic, like that of La Plata, and we turn our back on him. No, sir, we will not receive him. The brilliant costumes of the Ministers of the Royal Governments are seen glistening in the circles of our drawing rooms, and their splendid equipages rolling through the avenues of the Metropolis; but the unaccredited Minister of the Republic, if he visit our President or Secretary of State at all, must do it incog., lest the eye of Don Onís should be offended by so unseemly a sight! Mr. C. said, he hoped the gentleman from South Carolina, who was so capable of estimating the effect of moral causes, would see some use in recognising the independence of La Plata. He appealed to the powerful effect of moral causes, manifested in the case of the French Revolution, when, by their influence, that nation swept from about her the armies of the combined Powers by which she was environed, and rose up the colossal Power of Europe. There was an example of the effect of moral power. All the patriots asked, all they wanted at our hands, was to be recognised as, what they had been for the last eight years, an independent Power.

But, it seems, said Mr. C., we dare not do this, lest we tread on sacred ground; and an honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SMYTH) who, when he has been a little longer in this House, will learn to respect its powers, calls it an usurpation on the part of this House. Has the gentleman weighed the terms which he employed? If I mistake not, the gentleman, in the debate respecting the power to make internal improvements, called that too an usurpation on the part of this House. That power, too, however, he admitted to belong to the Executive, and traced it to an imperial source, informing us that Cæsar, or somebody else, had exercised it. Sir, the gentleman has mistaken his position here; he is a military chieftain and an admirable defender of Executive authority, but he has yet to learn his horn-book as to the powers of this branch of the Legislature. Usurpation, Mr. C. said, is arrogating to yourself authority which is vested elsewhere. But what was it that he proposed, to which this term had been applied? To appropriate money to pay a foreign Minister his outfit and a year's salary. If that be an usurpation, said he, we have been usurping power from the commencement of the Government to the present time. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has never reported an appropriation bill without some instance of this usurpation.

There are three modes under our Constitution, in which a nation may be recognised: by the Executive receiving a Minister; secondly, by its sending one thither; and, thirdly, this House unquestionably has the right to recognise, in the exercise of the Constitutional power of Congress to regulate foreign commerce. To receive a Minister from a foreign Power is an admission that the party sending him is sovereign and independent. So the sending a Minister, as Ministers are never sent but to sovereign Powers, is a recognition of the independence of the Power to whom the Minister is sent. Now, the honorable gentleman from South Carolina would have preferred the expression of our opinion by a resolution, independent of the appropriation bill. If the gentleman would vote for it in that shape, I would really gratify him; all that I want to do is to convey to the President an expression of our willingness, that the Government of Buenos Ayres should be recognised. Whether it shall be done by receiving a Minister or sending one, is quite immaterial. It is urged that there might be an impropriety in sending a Minister, not being certain, after what has passed, that he would be received; but, Mr. C., said, that was one of the questions submitted to the discretion of the Executive, which he would determine, upon a view of all the circumstances, and who of course would previously have an understanding that our Minister would be duly respected. If gentlemen desired to know what a Minister from us was to do, Mr. C. said he would have him congratulate the Republic on the establishment of free government and on their liberation from the ancient dynasty of Spain; assure it of the interest we feel in its welfare, and of our readiness to concur in any arrangements which might be advantageous to our mutual interest. Have we not, asked Mr. C., a Minister at the Brazils, a nation lying alongside of the provinces of La Plata, and considering the number of slaves in it, by no means so formidable as the latter, and about equidistant from us. In reference to the strength of the two Powers, that of La Plata is much the strongest, and the Government of Brazil, trembling under the apprehension of the effect of the arms of La Plata, has gone farther than any other Power to recognise its independence, having entered into a military convention with the Republic, by which each power guarantees the possession of the other. And we have exchanged Ministers with the Brazils. The one, however, is a Kingdom; the other a Republic; and if any gentleman could assign any better reason why a Minister should be sent to one and not to the other of these Powers, he should be glad to hear it disclosed, for he had not been able himself to discover it.

A gentleman had yesterday told the House that the news from Buenos Ayres was unfavorable. Take it all together, Mr. C. said, he believed it was not. But, he said, he put but little trust in such accounts. In our Revolution, incredulity of reports and newspaper stories, propagated by the enemy, had been so strengthened by experience, that at last nothing was believed which was not attested by the signature of "Charles Thompson." Mr. C. said he was somewhat similarly situated; he could not believe these reports—he wished to see "Charles Thompson" before he gave full credit to them. The vessel which had arrived at Baltimore, and which, by the way, by its valuable cargo of specie, hides, and tallow, gave evidence of a commerce worth pursuing—brought some rumor of a difference between Artigas and the authorities of Buenos Ayres. With respect to the Banda Oriental, which was said to be occupied by Artigas, Mr. C. said it constituted but a very subordinate part of the territory of the United Provinces of La Plata; and it could be no more objection to recognising the nation because that province was not included within its power, than it could have been to our recognition, because several States held out against the adoption of the Constitution. Mr. C. repeated that before he attached any confidence to a letter not signed "Charles Thompson," he must know who the man is who writes it; what are his sources of information, his character for veracity, &c., and of all those particulars we were deprived of information in the case of the recent intelligence in the Baltimore papers, as extracted from private letters.

But, said Mr. C. we are charged, on the present occasion, with treading on sacred ground. Let me suppose, what I do not believe would be the case, that the President had expressed an opinion one way, and we another. At so early a period of our Government, because a particular individual fills the Presidential Chair—an individual whom I highly respect; more perhaps than some of those who would be considered his exclusive friends—is the odious doctrine to be preached here, that the Chief Magistrate can do no wrong? Is the doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance—are the principles of the Stuarts, to be revived in this free Government? Is an opinion to be suppressed and scouted, because it is in opposition to the opinion of the President? Sir, as long as I have a seat on this floor, I shall not hesitate to exert the independence which belongs to the Representative character—I shall not hesitate to express my opinions, coincident or not with those of the Executive. But, Mr. C. said that he could show that this cry had been raised on the present occasion without reason. He supposed a case: that the President had sent a Minister to Buenos Ayres, and this House had been called on to make an appropriation for his payment. He asked of gentlemen whether in that case they would not have voted an appropriation? And had not the House a right to deliberate on the propriety of the doing so, as well before as after a Minister was sent? Would gentlemen please to point out the difference? I contend, said Mr. C., that we are the true friends of the Executive; and that the title does not belong to those who have taken it. We wish to extend his influence and give him patronage; to give him means, as he has now the power, to send another Minister abroad. But, apart from this view of the question, as regarded the Executive power, this House, Mr. C. said, had the incontestable right to recognise a foreign nation, in the exercise of its power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. Suppose, for example, we passed an act to regulate trade between the United States and Buenos Ayres; the existence of the nation would be thereby recognised—as we could not regulate trade with a nation which does not exist.

The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) and the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SMYTH,) the great champion of Executive power, and the opponent of legislative authority, had contended that recognition would be cause of war. Mr. C. said these gentlemen were reduced to this dilemma: If it was cause of war, the Executive ought not to have the right to produce a war upon the country without consulting Congress. If it was no cause of war, it is an act which there was no danger in performing. There would be very little difference in principle between vesting the Executive with the power of declaring war, or with the power of necessarily leading the country into war, without consulting the authority to whom the power of making war is confided. But Mr. C. denied that it was cause of war; but, if it were, the sense of Congress ought certainly in some way or other to be taken on it, before that step was taken. He knew, he said, that some of the most distinguished statesmen in the country had taken the view of this subject, that the power to recognise the independence of any nation did not belong to the President; that it was a power too momentous and consequential in its character to belong to the Executive. His own opinion, Mr. C. confessed, was different, believing the power to belong to either the President or Congress, and that it might, as most convenient, be exercised by either. If aid was to be given, to afford which would be cause of war, however, Congress alone could give it.

This House, then, Mr. C. said, had the power to act on this subject, even though the President had expressed his opinion; which he had not further than, as appeared by the report of the Secretary of State, to decide that, in January last, it would not be proper to recognise them. But, Mr. C. said, the President stood pledged to recognise the Republic, if, on the return of the Commissioners, whom he has deputed, they should make report favorable to the stability of the Government. Those Commissioners sailed in December last, and might be expected to return in three or four months from this time. When they returned, then, Congress would not be in session. The President thus standing pledged, said Mr. C., I ask if we, who are disposed to invest him with the means of recognising that independence—of redeeming his pledge—are not the true friends of the Executive, and whether the opponents of this motion do not act as though they were not his friends? Suppose the chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations had reported a provision for an appropriation of the description which I propose, said Mr. C., should we not all have voted for it? And could any gentleman be so pliant, as, on the mere ground of an Executive recommendation, to vote an appropriation without exercising his own faculties on the question; and yet, when there is no such suggestion, will not even so far act for himself as to determine whether a Republic is so independent that we may fairly take the step of recognition of it? He hoped that no such submission to the Executive pleasure would characterize this House.

One more remark, and Mr. C. said he had done. One gentleman had told the House that the population of the Spanish provinces was eighteen millions; that we, with a population of two millions only, had conquered our independence; and that, if the southern provinces willed it, they must be free. This population, Mr. C. said, he had already stated, consisted of distinct nations, having but little, if any intercourse, the largest of which was Mexico; and they were so separated by immense distances that it was impossible there should be any co-operation between them. Besides, they have difficulties to encounter which we had not. They have a noblesse; they are divided into jealous castes, and a vast proportion of Indians; to which adding the great influence of the clergy, and it would be seen how widely different the circumstances of Spanish America were from those under which the Revolution in this country was brought to a successful termination. He had already shown how deep-rooted was the spirit of liberty in that country. He instanced the little island of Margarita, against which the whole force of Spain had been in vain directed, containing a population of only 16,000 souls; but where every man, woman, and child, was a Grecian soldier in defence of freedom. For many years the spirit of freedom had been struggling in Venezuela, and Spain had been unable to conquer it. Morillo, in an official despatch transmitted to the Minister of Marine of his own country, avows that Angosturo and all Guiana are in possession of the patriots, as well as all the country from which supplies could be drawn. According to the latest accounts, Bolivar and other patriot commanders were concentrating their forces, and were within one day's march of Morillo; and if they did not forsake the Fabian policy, which was the true course for them, the result would be, that even the weakness of the whole of the provinces of Spanish America would establish its independence, and secure the enjoyment of those rights and blessings which rightfully belong to it.

Mr. POINDEXTER, of Mississippi, claimed the indulgence of the Committee for that portion of their time which he felt it incumbent on him to occupy, in presenting to their consideration the views which he had taken of the motion submitted by the honorable member from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY.) Sir, said he, the liberty of the human species, in every quarter of the globe, is a theme, than which none can be more dear to the heart of the patriot and philanthropist; it was one on which he delighted to dwell, either in the tumultuous agitation of the legislative hall, or in the silent shades of retirement, where the mind envelopes the vast scope of the universe, and contemplates man in the various and diversified situations and circumstances in which he has been placed by his Creator, for the fulfilment of the wise and inscrutable purposes of an overruling Providence. In casting his eye over the great events of the present day, Mr. P. said, the struggle which exists in Spanish America to break the fetters which have so long chained them to the car of an European despot, arrested his attention with irresistible attractions, and exhibited a grand and interesting scene on which he could not look without the strongest solicitude for their ultimate success—a solicitude which might sometimes carry him even beyond the bounds which prudence would prescribe, to accelerate an epoch so auspicious in the history of the New World, and so honorable to the establishment of human rights on a secure and solid foundation. He yielded to none in his attachment to the cause of freedom; and the honorable Speaker, who had with so much eloquence and force portrayed the condition of the Spanish colonies, and the sufferings of their oppressed inhabitants, "seeking through blood and slaughter their long lost liberty," could not carry his sympathies in their behalf further than he did. He had listened to that honorable gentleman with unfeigned pleasure, and appreciated the lofty and magnanimous motives by which he was actuated; and it was to him a source of regret, that a sense of the duty which he owed to his constituents, to himself, and to his country, impelled him to give a vote in opposition to the motion on the table. He entreated gentlemen to return from the wanderings into which they had been led by the wide and diffuse debate to which this subject had given rise, and locate themselves on the isolated proposition on which we are required to deliberate and decide. The question is not whether the people, contending against the power of the Spanish monarch for their emancipation from the unnatural and cruel bondage to which they have been subjected for centuries past, are entitled to the independence to which they aspire; nor whether it is our policy, at this time, to render them assistance, by a participation in the conflict; but we are asked simply to make an appropriation of $18,000, "for one year's salary and an outfit to a Minister to the United Provinces of the Rio de la Plata—the salary to commence, and the outfit to be paid, whenever the President shall deem it expedient to send a Minister to said United Provinces." Is it expedient, under existing circumstances, to adopt a measure of this character, with a view to the recognition of the independence of these provinces? And if so, does it fall within the range of the Constitutional powers of the House of Representatives? He proposed to examine these points distinct from the multiplied topics which had been, in his opinion, improperly introduced into the discussion, and which shed no light on the question before the Committee.

He would not stop to investigate the commercial advantages which might result to this country from the establishment of independent governments in the Spanish South American colonies; because the right of a new Power to be received into the great family of nations is not dependent on calculations of dollars and cents, nor on its relative intercourse with the rest of the world; but it rests on the basis of historical facts, and the known ability of the people to govern themselves in their own way, uncontrolled by the Sovereign, from whose authority they have been rescued by their valor and patriotism. The existence of such a renovation in the political condition of a community, once satisfactorily manifested, and without further inquiry, he was prepared to accord to them the immunities incident to sovereignty, leaving commerce to seek its level in the regular and natural progress of events; but if temptations of gain, by an interchange of commodities, are considerations which ought, in any manner, to guide us on an occasion like the present, it had been sufficiently shown, in the course of the debate, by an honorable gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) that we had but little to hope from that source, in relation to the provinces of the Rio de la Plata. Of all the possessions of Spain on the continent of South America, engaged in hostilities with the parent country, we are least interested in forming a connexion with the district to which we are invited, by the proposed amendment, to send an accredited Minister. The distance by which we are separated from that country, and the wide extent of ocean which divides us, of difficult and perilous navigation, constitute insuperable barriers to a speedy and profitable intercourse, founded on the wants of the respective countries. Their pursuits are agricultural, so are ours; many of the articles which we export to foreign markets, they will, in a very short time, likewise export, and become rivals instead of customers in the great staple commodities of the United States. It is true that they remit annually a large amount of the precious metals; these we want, and to obtain them every facility ought to be afforded; but to obtain them something must be given in exchange. What shall we offer them in return for their gold and silver? Not breadstuffs—for they are supplied at home. Shall we send them our cotton, tobacco, sugars? No, sir; their climate and soil are admirably adapted to the cultivation of all these articles. Shall we find a market in that distant region, for our manufactures, which seem to be the sheet-anchor of our safety, if we are to judge from the solicitude manifested to extend to them the national patronage? Alas! they are drooping on our own soil. Protecting duties, amounting, in some instances, to the exclusion of foreign fabrics from our market, are found to be essentially necessary to force the sale of these manufactures on our own people. Can we, then, entertain the most distant hope that they will venture to seek that competition abroad, which they so carefully and sedulously avoid at home? Such a hope cannot for a moment be tolerated. Sir, we have nothing in which a direct trade to South America can be prosecuted with a reasonable prospect of profit. England alone will reap the rich harvest of those valuable markets, by means of her manufactures, which she can furnish of a superior quality and at more reduced prices than any other country. We may, perhaps, become the humble carriers, and in that way find employment for our shipping; but the delusive schemes of commercial monopoly, with which we have been so eloquently amused, will very soon vanish, "like the baseless fabric of a vision;" and with them, all the beneficial consequences which we had so fondly anticipated.

In reference to the great agricultural interest of the country, Mr. P. saw no inducement which ought to precipitate us into a measure of doubtful policy, in aid of the revolutionary colonies. We have extensive and fertile territories, yet to populate, capable of yielding the richest productions of the earth. Let us dispose of these, and, as far as practicable, condense the physical strength of the Republic. The hand of industry is nerved by the ravenous demand, which exists in every part of Europe, for the raw materials with which we annually supply them. The laborer is rewarded beyond the example of any former period. Mr. P. asked, if a state of prosperity and tranquillity, like that we now enjoy, ought to be jeopardized in the pursuit of objects, which so far as they favored the cause of personal liberty, came in collision with the best interests of the United States. Suppose, sir, the fine provinces of Mexico in our immediate neighborhood are opened to the plough, and the inhabitants engage in the active pursuits of agriculture, unrestrained by the arbitrary hand of power, by which their energies have been so long paralyzed, what would the effect of that happy change in their condition be on the productions of our own country? A competition in the important staples of cotton, sugar, tobacco, and flour, which, by increasing the quantity for exportation to European markets, would necessarily diminish their value, and, in the same proportion, depress that branch of labor which is the only solid basis of national and individual wealth. These results will unavoidably flow from the success of the revolutionary struggle in Spanish America. Mr. P. wished not to be understood as urging these considerations in opposition to the just claim which the oppressed, in all countries, have to dissolve the political bands which bind them to their oppressors. He meant merely to remove the impression which had been attempted to be made, that the people of this country were deeply interested in the issue of the conflict between Spain and her revolting colonies. He could perceive no pecuniary advantages, either commercial or agricultural, which we should derive from the overthrow of the Spanish authorities in Mexico, New Grenada, Chili, or the United Provinces of the Rio de la Plata, or in any other part of her South American possessions. But he did not rest his argument on calculations of profit and loss; he wished the patriots every success in their noble effort to erect for themselves independent governments; he believed they must ultimately triumph over the imbecile monarch who now so ingloriously, and so infamously wields the destinies of Spain. The question then recurs, will the amendment offered by the honorable Speaker, if adopted, give strength to the patriot cause? He humbly conceived not, and expressed his decided opinion, that it would be productive of consequences injurious to those for whose benefit it was introduced. He conceded the doctrine maintained by the honorable mover, that we have an undeniable right, if these districts, or colonies, have actually succeeded in establishing their independence, to acknowledge the fact, and to treat them with that respect due to the rank which they may have acquired. Such an act would not, in itself, be just cause of war to Spain, or any other Power; because, if we, in other respects, maintain a strict neutrality, the mere recognition of an existing fact in relation to the belligerent parties, would neither weaken or invigorate either of them; it would be entirely harmless and innocent. But it is not enough to show, that we possess the abstract right to take this step, it ought likewise to appear from unequivocal official testimony, that these provinces are ipso facto independent, and in the face of the world stand absolved from their allegiance to the Spanish monarch. Is this the condition of the people of the United Provinces of the Rio de la Plata?

What, Mr. Chairman, is the nature and extent of the evidence on which we are to pronounce this fact, and pledge the national responsibility for its existence? Newspaper publications, extracts of letters, bulletins of the Commander-in-Chief of the Revolutionary forces, and the message of Pueyrredon, who styles himself the supreme director of the Republic of La Plata! And, sir, those scraps are ingeniously arranged, and gravely offered, as the foundation of a measure involving the consistency, the honor, and perhaps the peace of the nation. Mr. P. protested against this premature and unauthorized proceeding. The introduction of a new sovereign among the nations of the earth is a measure of no ordinary character; it has ever been adopted with great caution and circumspection; and it would be folly and madness in this Government to volunteer in so hazardous an enterprise, without a full knowledge of every circumstance essential to its vindication, founded on incontestable documents, about which no subsequent controversy can arise. Let us hesitate in a case of so much delicacy, and maturely calculate the consequences before we involve the people of this country in a dilemma from which there is no retreat. Past experience will justify the declaration, that although the mere recognition of a new Power is not, according to the principles of public law, justifiable cause of war, nine times out of ten it leads to war. Sir, if you introduce a stranger into a drawing-room, or other genteel society, you identify him with yourself; you are security for his good behaviour; and if he prove a vagabond, or swindler, your own dignity and reputation sustain no inconsiderable reproach. Shall we enter into recognizance for the supreme director of La Plata, give him the right hand of fellowship, raise him into factitious consequence, and then embark in his quarrels to save ourselves from disgrace? Remember, sir, that France, during the Revolution, after much deliberation, acknowledged our independence, and concluded with us a commercial treaty. England did not wait to inquire into the motives of the French Government, nor to discuss the belligerent character of these transactions; but the signal for war was immediately hoisted, and hostilities commenced between the two nations. Are we prepared for similar results, and, if we are, what adequate inducements have we for the sacrifice, either in our own country, or the people whom we profess to serve? Our feelings are approached, and our sympathies excited, by the high sounding terms, liberty and republicanism. Our free institutions are said to be imitated, and our countrymen revered, in our sister Republic of La Plata. Would to God, Mr. Chairman, that such, in reality, were the principles and habits of these unfortunate people! The statesman, devoted to the amelioration of the condition of mankind, and the downfall of tyranny throughout the civilized world, might look with pride and pleasure on their exertions, if a reasonable and well-founded expectation could be indulged, that they would eventuate in the establishment of a Constitution like that which secures to us the free enjoyment of all that is dear to man—his life, liberty, property, and the religion of his choice. What indications have they given of attachment to the fundamental principles of free Government? Are the people represented, or their rights defined, or tribunals established, responsible for an upright and impartial administration of the laws? No, sir! Pueyrredon, the supreme director, is a military chief, who rules his miserable subjects with a rod of iron. He makes the law, defines it, and enforces the execution of his decrees at the point of the bayonet. Property is held by the insecure tenure of his will, and even the sanctity of private correspondence is violated under the severe regulations of this jealous and arbitrary ruler.

In the various transmutations of power which have marked the progress of this revolution, personal ambition, and not the good of the people, seems to have been the great desideratum. At this moment, no one can say, with certainty, who is in possession of the sceptre, nor whether a Minister from this country would be received and respected; for, notwithstanding all that has been said, as to the veneration felt in this sister Republic for citizens of the United States, those who had ventured to hazard the experiment either returned to their own shores with broken fortunes and melancholy disappointment, or remained degraded, neglected, and suspected, and, in some instances, have found an asylum in the confines of a loathsome dungeon. Mr. P. could perceive nothing which ought to induce the Committee to plunge this country into an alliance with a Government so doubtful in its stability, and so little resembling the vivid description which had been, as he conceived, incorrectly given of it by the honorable Speaker; and he contended further, that, if all which had been advanced, to show the commercial and political interest which we have in the independence of Spanish America should be admitted, yet it would be worse than useless, at this time, to send a Minister to the Rio de la Plata. The effects of the measure might be productive of serious embarrassment to those provinces. We do not intend to offer them assistance in men, money, or ships of war. We cannot add to their strength or afford them greater facilities in procuring arms and munitions of war, than they at present possess; they have already free access to our ports, and while here, they receive the protection which is extended to the flag of every other friendly Power. We maintain towards them the relations of impartial neutrality, and place them, in all respects, on an equal footing with the monarch against whom they are contending. The formal exchange of diplomatic agents could not produce one solitary benefit, or enlarge, in the smallest degree, the privileges enjoyed under the existing laws and regulations respecting all the colonies or districts of people in South America. But, said Mr. P., the most deleterious consequences may flow from an attempt to incorporate this new partner into the Confederacy of nations. Hitherto the combined Powers of Europe have looked, with folded arms, on the war raging between Spain and her colonies; they have, with the single exception of England, very little interest in the event of the contest; and England is prepared to take either side which shall open to her the best prospect of commercial emolument. Will the same indifference be felt when the united provinces of the Rio de la Plata claim the rank of a free, sovereign, and independent State, and exhibit the parchment of the United States in support of their pretensions? He thought it, at least, extremely probable that a stride so sudden and unexpected might excite the jealous apprehensions and arouse the sleeping energies of that band of legitimates, who, having subjugated the Old World, have time and leisure to regulate the affairs of the other hemisphere. Is it compatible with sound and prudent policy to agitate a question which may bring on our own country the calamities of another war, and unite the crowned heads of Europe, now tranquil and passive, in crushing the revolutions which otherwise might terminate in the emancipation of Spanish America? Sir, the measure is fraught with incalculable mischief, and cannot be justified either on the ground of principle or facts, so far as they have come to our knowledge through any regular official channel.

The form of Government, Mr. P. said, in this new-fangled Republic, is not such as to raise a single emotion of sympathy; its durability is altogether a matter of conjecture, and no valuable object can be attained by its recognition. Why, then, Mr. P. asked, should we precipitately take an attitude which subsequent information might oblige us to relinquish, and thereby subject this Government to reproachful imputations, derogatory to the high character which it has ever maintained for justice, magnanimity, and unshaken firmness? Mr. P. proceeded. He felt the greatest anxiety for the independence of every portion of the continent of North America, without regard to the particular institutions which they might adopt for their own government. He wished to confine the Powers of Europe to the boundaries which nature had prescribed, and to establish an American confederacy of sovereignties, uncontrolled by the doctrines of European policy. Such a change in the state of the world would be highly favorable to human happiness; it would promote the progress of science and the diffusion of liberal principles over countries enveloped in ignorance, bigotry, and superstition. But, Mr. P. differed in opinion with those honorable gentlemen who seemed to imagine that the provinces of Spanish America would follow our example in the freedom of their institutions, should they succeed in the establishment of their independence. Such a reformation can only be effected by gradual encroachments on their ancient customs and usages, with which they have become familiar, and from which they will not suddenly depart. Mr P. called the attention of gentlemen to the experiments already made, and especially that in Mexico, whose proximity to the United States rendered it more probable that our form of government would be understood and appreciated. They had a constitution, matured under the auspices of several enlightened citizens of the United States; but it was found to be impracticable to put any system in operation, without a departure from the fundamental principles of a free constitution. Religious toleration was scouted, as altogether inadmissible, and irreconcilable with the habits of the people. The Catholic religion was established; the trial by jury was provided for, and the written instrument which they had promulgated to the world contained scarcely a single republican feature. They, too, had their Congress, published their manifesto, and invited all the nations of the world to embrace their cause and assist in expelling the royal forces. Where then was the redeeming spirit of the West, that it did not invoke the National Councils to acknowledge the Mexican Republic, and send a Minister with a suitable outfit and salary to represent us at that Court? They had stronger claims on us, and were better entitled to our co-operation than are the United Provinces of the Rio de la Plata. And, sir, we have seen the fatal error into which we should have fallen had the course now recommended by the honorable Speaker been adopted in relation to Mexico. Internal feuds arose; the Congress was dissolved; everything like order was prostrated; the patriot forces dispersed, and our Minister, on his arrival, would have been puzzled to find a Supreme Director to whom he might deliver his credentials, make his debut, and claim an audience of leave. Since that period the command of the revolutionary army has been transferred from one General to another; some have become traitors, and others have fallen in battle, or been massacred by the inexorable Spaniard; and, if our information be correct, the spirit of resistance to the authority of Spain in that quarter is almost entirely extinct. We are, however, told to-day, that Mina still lives, and continues to prosecute the war with increased vigor. Sir, there is too much reason to doubt the correctness of this intelligence; but, if it be true, every heart must beat with anxious wishes for his success in a cause so just as that in which he is engaged. The people of Mexico want no foreign aid, if they are united in their opposition to the feeble monarch by whose minions they are oppressed. Six millions of inhabitants need only will it, and they must be free; but, divided in sentiment as they are, without a union of action and of object, should we send an army into their country, in aid of the patriots, it would be necessary first to conquer the natives into a knowledge and love of freedom, and then the royal mercenaries would fall an easy sacrifice. Much as he desired to hasten the period of their emancipation, Mr. P. said he was not disposed to disturb the enviable and prosperous condition of his own country by engaging in these quixotic expeditions; his primary duty on this floor was to guard with vigilance the rights and interests of his constituents and the nation at large, avoiding all unnecessary collisions with foreign Powers. He was willing to treat the revolting colonies of Spain in precisely the same manner that France treated us in the war of the Revolution, and as we treated France in the commencement of her Revolution.

Mr. P. took a rapid view of the events of the war which terminated in our separation from Great Britain, and undertook to show, from the history of that interesting epoch, that our conduct in relation to the united provinces of the Rio de la Plata, had surpassed in liberality the example of the French Government towards us, under similar circumstances. "Very early in the contest, the attention of America had been directed to foreign Powers, and particularly to France. The absolute want of arms and ammunition, and the impossibility of obtaining an adequate supply of those articles by ordinary means, had induced the appointment, in 1775, of agents to procure military stores abroad, whose communications were with a secret committee, empowered to correspond with their friends in Great Britain, Ireland, and other parts of the world. Soon afterwards, Mr. Silas Deane was deputed to France, as a political and commercial agent. He arrived in Paris in the Spring of 1776, with instructions to sound the dispositions of the Cabinet, on the existing controversy between Great Britain and her colonies, and to endeavor to obtain supplies of military stores." Our agent was, it is true, received, and permitted to load three vessels with military stores, but, before they sailed, the order for this accommodation was suspended, and the supplies were obtained by secret means, without the open sanction of that Government. The French Cabinet proceeded with great caution in every step which they took to favor the cause of America; always keeping in view their own interest, and making that alone the standard of their policy. The idea of sending a Minister to this country, never entered into the imagination of any one, either in France or America. The Revolutionary Congress took the lead in every measure, calculated to conciliate the support of foreign Powers. They demanded nothing, nor did they expect anything, on the score of etiquette. Acting on these principles, as soon as they had come to a resolution in favor of the declaration of independence, a committee was appointed to prepare the plan of a treaty to be proposed to foreign Powers, which after mature deliberation, was agreed to, and Ministers were appointed to negotiate the treaties proposed. Doctor Franklin, Mr. Deane, and Mr. Jefferson, were chosen to accomplish this important object. The result is known to all. The Commercial Treaty with France was followed up by one of alliance, offensive and defensive, and she from that moment became identified with us, in the great struggle which secured the liberties of our country. Have we not manifested corresponding dispositions towards the colonies of Spain, with a frankness and candor which seeks no concealment behind the curtain of diplomatic intrigue? We openly avow our partiality for their cause, and offer up our prayers for their success. They have sent us commercial and political agents, who have been received and treated with every mark of respect; their communications are considered with attention, and everything which they ask, not inconsistent with the national interest and honor, is accorded to them. If they want arms and ammunition, or military stores, of whatsoever description, our ports are thrown open for them, and our citizens are ready and anxious to supply them with all that the country affords; their flag is respected, their property and their people protected, while within the jurisdictional limits of the United States. The Supreme Director of La Plata has, at this time, here, a commercial and political agent, whose correspondence with Mr. Adams, the Secretary of State, has been submitted to Congress by the President. He does not claim to be recognised as the Minister of his Government, authorized to enter into any treaty of compact whatever. And shall we compromise the dignity of this nation, by sending an accredited Minister with full powers, to a country not yet known on the map of nations, even before we are called on to receive one of a similar character, from the new Government, said to be erected in that country, under the control of a military chief, whose power may be swept away by the issue of a single battle? Sir, said Mr. P., such a precedent is not on record; it is in defiance of all experience, in the changes to which political societies are liable, and their transitions from one form of government to another. The proud Republic of France, with her conquering armies, sweeping everything before them with the besom of destruction, despatched a Minister to the United States, before she expected an acknowledgment from us of her independence. Mr. Genet, in addition to his other diplomatic functions, was charged with a stand of colors, to be presented to President WASHINGTON, as a testimonial of the high estimation in which both himself and his country were held by Republican France. These flattering overtures were met in a manner, and with a promptitude, called for by an occasion so grateful to the noble feelings of the Father of his Country. A Cabinet Council was convened, and, after solemn deliberation, the French Republic was recognised, and the distinguished citizen who now enjoys the first honors of the nation was designated to represent our interest at that Court. But what, at that interesting crisis, would have been thought of a proposition in the House of Representatives appropriating a salary and outfit for a Minister to France, anterior to an intimation of a wish, on her part, to reciprocate with us the relations of amity? He could not believe, that it would have found an advocate in the most enthusiastic admirer of the French Revolution. The subject was then left, where it properly belonged, to the sound discretion of the Executive department, charged by the Constitution with the discharge of those particular duties. And yet, sir, we are referred to the examples of these revolutions to justify a direct violation of every precedent which they furnish, by resolving to send a Minister to the united provinces of Rio de la Plata, in return for her commercial and political agent, at a time when all the horrors of a bloody civil war still rage, even among these very provinces; where force and fear are the only guarantees of power, and the events of a single day may unhinge all that has been gained by a ten years' war. And we have yet to learn the practical good which is expected to flow from this innovation on the established usages of nations. The friends of the proposed amendment claim for it the amiable attributes of innocence and charity; and, thus decorated, they offer it as a sacrifice, on the altar of feeling, to the sacred cause of liberty. The honorable Speaker seems to imagine, that it will produce a powerful moral effect, and nerve the arm of the patriotic soldier with fresh vigor and energy. Sir, it is a melancholy fact, that the people of these provinces are, in general, ignorant of all the transactions of the civilized world; they are incapable of estimating the value of anything which does not afford them immediate relief; and it is extremely probable, that not one-tenth of them will either know that we have a Minister in their country, or feel the smallest interest whether we have or not. The moral influence of the measure will be lost on them. Pueyrredon, the Supreme Director, if he be a man of talents, and we have reason to think him so, will derive but little consolation from the parchment, on which will be written the credentials of our Minister, or the empty resolutions of Congress, assigning to him rank and consequence, without the means of maintaining it. He is well aware, that we add not a man to his armies; not a ship to his navy; nor put a cent into the vaults of his treasury. He is not ignorant of the solicitude which is felt by every class of citizens in this country for the triumph of Republican principles throughout the world, and we can impart to him no other moral motive which would be worthy of his acceptance.

Spanish American Provinces.

Mr. P. next proceeded to consider this question in reference to the distribution of powers confided by the Constitution to the several Departments of the Government. By the 2d section of the 2d article of the Constitution, the President is vested with power to "nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers, and Consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers not herein provided for, and which shall be established by law. But the Congress may, by law, vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments." The amendment consists of two parts: First, an appropriation of eleven thousand dollars; and second, it proposes to vest the President alone with authority to send a Minister to the Rio de La Plata, wherever he shall deem it expedient to do so. If the object be to place the amount of money proposed to be appropriated at the disposal of the Executive, it could be attained by simply making that addition to the contingent fund; it would, in that case, be expended or not, according to the exigencies which might arise in the recess of Congress. But if, taken in connexion with the subsequent part of the amendment, it is intended to clothe the President alone with power to appoint a foreign Minister, then it is manifestly unconstitutional, and ought not to be adopted. The power to appoint Ambassadors and other public Ministers, can be exercised only "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," and it would conflict with the express letter of the Constitution to vest it, by law, in the President alone. These high and responsible public functionaries cannot be classed among the grade of inferior officers, whose appointment may be given to the "President alone, or to the Heads of Departments." Such an exposition of the Constitution is inadmissible, if we regard either the letter or spirit of that instrument; and if we sanction the principle of the amendment, the power to appoint this new Minister might, with equal propriety, be vested in the Secretary of State, or any other Head of Department. He contended, that the President wanted no act of legislation to enlarge his powers, whenever he deemed it expedient to send Ambassadors to foreign countries. No such appointment can be made without the concurrence of the Senate, and if they approve it, the salary and outfit are already provided for, by a general law, and need not the aid of a special appropriation. Sir, the proposition is, in itself, nugatory, unless we consider it directory to the President, on a point of duty devolved on him by the Constitution; it casts an indirect censure on the Executive for neglecting to fulfil the obligations which we feel to acknowledge the independence of this new Power in South America. Foreign nations, and, perhaps, our own citizens, will imbibe that impression, and the Chief Magistrate will be considered as having incurred the frowns of the Representatives of the people, whose interposition has become necessary to urge that high officer to a faithful discharge of the trust proposed in him by his countrymen. Mr. P. was far from attributing such sentiments to the advocates of this amendment, but the inference was, to his mind, irresistible. He saw no foundation on which to rest the slightest imputation on the President, whose cautious and prudent policy merited the approbation of an enlightened people. Our neutral relations between the belligerent parties had been maintained with impartiality. No privilege, enjoyed by Spain was withheld from her colonies, which could, in any manner, favor the hostile operations of either. A special mission has been instituted, composed of three distinguished citizens, to visit these colonies, ascertain their political condition, the nature and probable stability of their Governments, and their report will form the basis of our subsequent measures respecting them. The wisdom of these precautionary steps will be tested by time and experience; and, without the spirit of prophecy, he ventured to predict, that they would contribute, in a high degree, to enlighten our future deliberations, and relieve us from the embarrassments into which we may be thrown by the premature attempt which is now made, to dictate a course to the Executive, in the absence of authentic information on the subject to which it relates. On questions touching our intercourse with foreign nations, it is of the utmost importance, that all branches of the Government should move in concert, each within the limits prescribed to it by the Constitution. But, the honorable Speaker has contended, that, in deputing Ministers to foreign countries, we possess a co-ordinate will and power with the Executive, in providing for the payment of their salaries, and he has referred, in support of his argument, to laws fixing the salaries of Consuls, and other public agents. That the Legislature alone possesses the right to apportion the salaries of all officers acting under the authority of the United States, will not be contested; but, the appointment of these officers, with a few exceptions, is confided to the President and Senate. Our portion of the duty has been long since performed; we have regulated the salaries and outfits of foreign Ministers, and the Executive is to decide, when and where it may be necessary to send them. Mr. Chairman, it will be recollected, that, at the opening of the present session of Congress, the President, in order to prevent all misapprehension, as to his opinions on the subject of internal improvements, communicated them freely in his Message. He believed, that the power to construct roads and canals, within the respective States, was not possessed by Congress, and, therefore, felt bound to withhold his signature from any bill which might be passed, establishing a general system of internal improvement. The honorable Speaker condemned this premature expression of the Executive opinion, as an unwarrantable encroachment on the freedom of legislation, and the privileges of the House of Representatives, to whom the right of originating all laws was given by the Constitution. The President, although an integral branch of the Legislature, it was urged, ought to have reserved his objections until he was called on to act in the regular Constitutional order of proceeding. Yes, sir, said Mr. P., we originate laws, and the President may reject them, or not, at pleasure. And does it not equally belong to the President to originate foreign missions, and, "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Ambassadors, and other public Ministers?" The power is granted in express terms, and we have no other check on its exercise, but by refusing to make the necessary appropriations. And yet the honorable Speaker claims for the House of Representatives the co-ordinate right to institute a mission to the Rio de La Plata, and considers it no encroachment on the powers delegated by the Constitution to the President and Senate! It remains for that honorable gentleman to distinguish the two cases, and to reconcile the seeming inconsistency into which he has fallen.

Mr. P. would detain the Committee but a few moments longer. We are told of the wrongs which Spain has committed on our national flag; of her spoliation on our commerce; of her violations of the personal liberty of our citizens; her protracted negotiations, and ultimate refusal to do us justice for any of the long catalogue of injuries of which we complain. He most heartily concurred in the sentiment, that we ought to seek redress for these wrongs and injuries. He would instantly demand of the faithless and treacherous Ferdinand "indemnity for the past, and security for the future;" and if these just demands were refused, he would proceed to make reprisals on her territories within our reach, as an indemnification for her spoliation on the high seas, and her violations of treaty. And, sir, if war should be the consequence, her colonies are open to us, and, in that event, they will become legitimate objects of conquest. Let war be proclaimed, and, he doubted not, that, in six weeks, without the aid of bounties in land, or money, an army of thirty thousand hardy sons of the West would be ready to march into Mexico, and drive into the ocean every royal minion who now revels on the spoils of an oppressed and degraded people. But if we are to have war, said he, it should be made on the basis of our own wrongs. Our territorial dispute, and other points of difference with Spain, ought not to be translated to the Rio de La Plata, New Grenada, Chili, or elsewhere, on the continent of South America; but let us vindicate, with manly firmness, our own rights, regardless of the consequences. He was not alarmed with the apprehension that, in such a war, the combined sovereigns of Europe would engage on the side of Spain. England will make no war in which her own immediate interest is not materially concerned; and Spain can offer her no equivalent for the loss of her lucrative commerce with this country. Nor is it at all probable that the Emperor of Russia would abandon his great scheme in Europe, and send his Cossacks to the southern coast of America, where the climate itself would be more fatal than the swords of the most furious enemy. And, as to the other petty Powers, who follow in the train of the legitimates, they find sufficient employment in preserving their authority at home. Their protests and menaces will vanish into smoke whenever the period of action arrives. Sir, at the time we took possession of that part of Louisiana which lies above the island of New Orleans, and west of the Perdido, the Minister of Great Britain entered his formal and solemn protest against the procedure. We were then threatened with British interposition in behalf of His Majesty's ally, the adored and immaculate Ferdinand. But the matter ended precisely where it began. We have remained in the occupation of the country which, of right, belongs to us, and it was neither made cause of war, nor insisted on at the Treaty of Ghent. His Majesty's other allies, the savages of the Northwest, were remembered, but the affair of Florida was forgotten—was consigned to oblivion, and wholly abandoned in the negotiations. And such will always be the end of empty protests, in which the party making them has no direct interest. Let us, then, march forward, with a firm step, and plant the American standard on the Perdido and the Rio del Norte, the ancient limits of Louisiana; and there will be found in this nation both the will and the ability to sustain our indisputable right to these boundaries, against every combination which may be formed to curtail them. But he would not withdraw the attention of the world from the substantial grounds of controversy between this country and Spain, by an ill-timed and useless interference in the affairs of her South American colonies.

He felt it a painful duty, before he sat down, to notice a remark which fell from the honorable Speaker, when he last addressed the Chair. The honorable gentleman, if he correctly understood him, had said, that Mr. Aguirre, the commercial and political agent from the Government of La Plata, was obliged to sneak into the office of the Secretary of State, or obtain secret interviews with the President, to avoid the eye of Don Onis! Mr. P. had heard the observation with regret. He was not the eulogist of any man, whatever might be the official rank which he occupied; but it was due to justice to say that the present Chief Magistrate of the nation had ever been distinguished for frankness, integrity, and unbending firmness. At the dawn of manhood he had entered the tented field, and fought the battles of his country, with the heroes and patriots who achieved the independence which we now enjoy. View him at subsequent periods in the legislative councils of his native State and of the Union—follow him into foreign countries, as the representative of his Government, at the most enlightened Courts of Europe, and we find him, on all occasions, the faithful public servant, and the inflexible patriot and republican. Return with him again to his own country, placed in a high and responsible station in the administration of its affairs, at a crisis which called forth all our energies, we find him relinquishing the first office in the Cabinet, at a time when gloomy despair covered the inhabitants of this desolated city, and, by assuming the arduous and perilous duties of the Department of War, he contributed in no small degree to the glorious issue of our recent conflict with Great Britain. And, Mr. Chairman, the future historian, who records the events of his life, and who shall "nothing extenuate nor set down aught in malice," will pronounce him to be an able, upright, and intelligent statesman, whose sole object in every situation has been the good of his country.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, said he should be unworthy of the confidence now reposed in him, and of that he desired to obtain, if he permitted some remarks which had been made to pass without reply. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. TUCKER) said, that my strictures on the character of the Spanish American contest, might have been spared; while the Speaker alleges that I am the only person who has been unjust to the patriot cause. Is it come to this, that, on the discussion of measures in this Hall, the truth is to be spared? That our sentiments are to be weighed, and phrases to be minced, lest they should fall too harshly on the ear of morbid delicacy? Injustice! Is it unjust to vindicate the character of my own countrymen, degraded by a comparison with persons unworthy of a place by their sides? It is the Speaker who has been unjust—not, indeed, to the aliens of our blood, but to our fathers. He courted the investigation which has been made; and how has it been conducted? In examining the origin and nature of the contest, I have drawn my information from the sources to which he directed our attention. Have I erred in the statement of any fact, or even colored, beyond its natural hue, any event which has been related? Had an instance of either kind been pointed out, the proper atonement should be made by a frank and prompt acknowledgment of the error. Is it injustice to say, that individual liberty is not the object of the Spanish American contest? What are the blessings secured to the people by the struggle? How have the ancient laws been changed to better the condition of the people? On these important points we have not been instructed. We have heard of the fertile regions, and formidable armies, and rich commerce, of Spanish America; but what is the condition of the people? Are they the masters or the slaves of the Revolution? They are contending for political independence, and have my most ardent wishes for their success. The consequence of complete success may be the enjoyment of civil liberty—may be—I am not certain, that it will. The condition of the people cannot, indeed, be altered for the worse. Under any form of government that may be established, they cannot be more oppressed than under the dominion of Spain. If to doubt the most favorable issue of this struggle be a crime, I am, indeed, criminal. If, to fear that freedom, civil and religious, will not follow, be censurable, I deserve reproach. More than once, in the last twenty years, our sympathy has been demanded by the people of different nations of the South, embarked in the tempestuous sea of liberty. What nation has reached the place to which its course was directed; the desired haven of repose, security, and enjoyment? While the hearts of the timid were palsied by fear, and even the brave shuddered by the terrors around them, some armed chieftain, or bigoted priest, has poured out the oily oil of despotism, and bid the agitated waves be still. Who, sir, will venture boldly to predict, that the same scene is not to be acted on the Southern continent?

The time has been, when my young heart swelled with emotion at the sound of liberty. But these days of youthful delusion have passed, hope, forever. I trust that I have now learned to distinguish between things and names. With enthusiasm undiminished, and a desire the most ardent for the freedom of all mankind, I am no longer to be duped by glorious titles and endearing sounds. In the course of a life, not yet extended to forty years, I have had much experience on this subject. The generous sympathies of the people of the United States have been often demanded, and sometimes felt, for those who were unworthy of it. In the days of Revolutionary France, age, innocence, genius, and virtue, were indiscriminately proscribed; heads fell by thousands, as sacrifices at the shrine of liberty. Consuls were chosen to rule in the name of liberty. The First Consul was converted into an Emperor; he exercised imperial powers in the name of liberty. The King of Spain was deposed by France, and reinstated by allied Europe, in the name of liberty. Napoleon swept, with his formidable legions, half the continent of Europe, marking his course with fire and blood; this, too, was in the name of liberty. Combined Europe precipitated itself, like a terrible avalanche, on the plains of France, burying, under its weight, the power and the glory of France; the power, not the glory, of France—that is imperishable—in the name of liberty. This experience has not been without its effect. I do not permit my feelings to be excited, much less my conduct to be influenced by the sound, without satisfying myself that liberty is something more than a name among those for whom I am called upon to feel or to act.

The facts, illustrating the character of the Government of La Plata, and the love of its rulers for our fellow-citizens and our institutions, are called tales; and the gentleman from Kentucky wishes to hear both sides before he forms a definite opinion; he asks for official information from La Plata! What infatuation! Sir, these tales are the statements of American citizens—of our brethren. Does he ask for confirmation or contradiction from American Spaniards? Will he venture to doubt their accuracy on the faith of any interested foreigner, or foreign Government?

But the Speaker has said that even a gray-headed Revolutionary patriot, whose cheeks were furrowed by age, could not address a prayer to the throne of God, in behalf of the patriot cause, without my animadversion. Have I forgot the respect due to venerable age, disregarded the gratitude earned by Revolutionary service, and violated the reverence due to the minister of the Religion of Peace? I should abhor myself were I capable of such an offence. The prayers of all good men rise to Heaven for the success of the Spanish Americans, because, in that success, the only chance is afforded of securing to the individuals concerned the dearest rights of human nature. The circumstance referred to was mentioned without praise or censure—a fact witnessed by all, and strongly illustrating the truth of a position I was endeavoring to enforce, that there was a striking and peculiar contrast between the interest excited by this proposition and the proposition itself.

But, sir, I was mistaken in supposing this question unimportant, insignificant, and unmeaning.

It has now become a question to which important consequences are attached. The honorable Speaker has told us what these consequences will be; this little proposition is to be the new dividing line of parties in the United States. Those who vote for it are to be the self-styled, and, I suppose, exclusive friends of liberty. If I may follow the example of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. JOHNSON,) and borrow a metaphor from Holy Writ, this is to be the Red Sea to divide the people of Israel from the Egyptian host, through which, the one, under their inspired leader, are to march in safety and triumph to the promised land of popularity and power; while the other, with their present enjoyments and future hopes, are to be buried deep beneath its wave.

But, said Mr. F., in conclusion, let gentlemen who have been warmly excited on this question recollect that, though so much consequence has been attached to it, the difference between those contending so earnestly on this floor is a difference as to time and manner. The only difference is as to the prudence and expediency of acting on the subject at the present time and in this way. There is not a gentleman who has addressed the Committee on the subject, who does not desire to recognise the independence of the Southern countries whenever it can be done consistently with a just regard to our own interests—to our own safety, which is our first duty. The only difference between us is that we do not wish to precede the proper official organ of the nation in order to recognise the independence of these countries, and those in favor of the motion wish to do so. There is no member of the Committee who does not know and feel that the wishes and feelings of the Executive Magistrate point in the same direction with that of the Representatives of the people. Sir, where the difference between us is so small, however anxious we may feel for the success of our particular views, I hope that anxiety will cease when the question is decided. Whether the motion be adopted or rejected, let us recollect nothing but the ability and the eagerness which has been displayed in the contest, and feel nothing either of the bitterness of defeat or the joy of triumph.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland.—I feel myself compelled again to trouble the Committee by the Speaker's more than common attention to the observations I had the honor to submit to the consideration of the members. The Speaker has acted the part of an able swordsman; he has declined to meet the profound and able arguments of my friend from South Carolina, and has directed them against my feeble efforts made on the same side of the question. The one he found unanswerable, the other he has endeavored to defeat. The Committee will judge how far he has been successful.

The Speaker has done me the honor to admit that on commercial subjects I have some claim to the attention of the House, but has with a politeness peculiar to himself advised—nay, sir, almost forbid—me to speak on his particular province, to wit: the laws of nations. Why, sir, the Speaker forgets that I have been twenty-five years in Congress, in which time the law of nations has been frequently introduced and discussed; from which discussions, if I had never read Vattel, Martens, and Azuni, I might have obtained some knowledge. Nay, sir, the Speaker does not do himself justice, when he supposes that his instruction to Congress on the laws of nature and of nations has been totally lost on one of his hearers. Sir, I have read enough of those authors to know that an ingenious advocate, such as the Speaker, can easily find a sentence, selected from a whole, that may be converted to prove either his position or mine. But, Mr. Chairman, I quoted not the laws of nations; I confined myself to the laws of common sense, (which I recommend to the Speaker for perusal;) I quoted experience in our own glorious Revolution, to show that a recognition of the independence of revolted colonies was considered as a just cause of war. I gave stubborn facts in support of my argument; and how has the Speaker answered me? That it was not the recognition by France that induced Great Britain to declare war, but that France had entered into a Treaty of Alliance, offensive and defensive, with her revolted colonies. Here, then, the Speaker completely gives up the main point of his argument, to wit: that aid is just cause of war, but that recognition is not. Aid had been given by France for two years—yes, sir, great and important aid—and Great Britain did not declare war on that account; but the moment France treated with us as an independent people, the Speaker says, Great Britain declared war against her. But, I deny that Great Britain then knew that the treaty was offensive and defensive. What was the language in Parliament at that time? It was not that France had afforded aid, but that France "having treated with the revolted colonies as an independent people," the national honor imperiously compelled the nation to go to war, and punish the insult. But, what does the Speaker mean, by advising the President to send a Minister to La Plata? Is it simply to compliment the Supreme Director on his appointment; or would he not expect, as a thing of course, that he would go clothed with Plenipotentiary powers, and that he would be expected to make a treaty? According to the Speaker's notion, the sending a Minister to La Plata, and then recognising its independence, would not be just cause of war; but the moment we entered on a treaty, then we should have crossed the Rubicon, and Spain might show us her law book, and prove to us that she had just cause of war. I am of opinion, Mr. Chairman, that nations are governed very much by expediency as to what is just cause of war. If it had been expedient for Spain to declare war against the United States, she would long since have been able to have found in Vattel and Grotius something to substantiate that she had just cause of war. But, it was not expedient to Spain, and we are at peace, and I do wish we may continue so.

The Speaker has quoted, as a precedent for his unprecedented motion, that we fixed the salary and appropriated money to pay Consuls to the Barbary Powers. Consuls to the Powers of Europe, sir, are not allowed salaries; they are allowed fees, which, with the advantage to them as merchants, have been considered adequate compensation. Not so to Consuls in Barbary. We have no commerce with Algiers, Tunis, or Tripoli; and salaries fixed by law were necessary to enable the President to procure proper persons to go there and maintain the peace we had made with these Powers. The Speaker has also quoted the appropriation for Indian treaties, as a justification for his introducing his extraordinary motion. The Indians, sir, are within our own territory, and treaties with them are generally held for the purchase of their land. Such precedents will certainly have little weight: they are sometimes used for want of argument.

The Speaker has at last admitted that the table land of Mexico produces the best of wheat; but assures us, for our comfort, that the roads are so bad and the distance so great that flour cannot be brought to La Vera Cruz, without such an expense as will prevent the Mexicans from ever being able to enter into competition with us. And these, sir, are to be our protection—distance and bad roads! And yet the Speaker knows that a noble road has been commenced, and no doubt will be completed, if Mexico shall ever become independent, to La Vera Cruz; and that the distance is not greater than that of many Pennsylvania farmers, who have brought their flour to Baltimore; nor are their roads, as they now are, worse than the road has been from Bedford to Baltimore or Philadelphia. Flour for the supply of Havana has, within my recollection, been brought in sacks from Mexico to La Vera Cruz, and there shipped. In 1804, flour, valued at four hundred and seventeen thousand seven hundred and nine dollars, was shipped from La Vera Cruz to the Spanish colonies. If the Mexicans were under a good Government, their export of flour would, in all probability, soon equal ours. But, sir, what is the reason that the Speaker takes so much pains to show us that the Spanish colonies, if independent, cannot supply the world with articles similar to those produced in the United States, on equal terms? Why attempt to prove that the people of La Plata cannot become a navigating or commercial people? Is it not fair to believe, from his reasoning, that if the colonies enter into a competition, and injure us in foreign markets, by selling cotton, flour, tobacco, &c., at a lower price than our farmers can, that the Speaker himself would be of opinion that we ought not to be very earnest in promoting their independence, as I do, on the great principle of the freedom of mankind? Why attempt to show, that we have no cause to apprehend their competition with us in the articles our country produces?

I think, the Speaker has given me cause to complain. He has said, that I had attempted to show that New Grenada and Venezuela could enter into competition with us in the article of breadstuffs. The Committee will remember, that I had passed over those colonies, giving as a reason, that I saw the Committee were impatient. I had another reason, to wit: I had touched on the trade of those colonies on the neutrality bill, and I have an aversion to tell the same story twice. However, I will help the Speaker out. Those two provinces would be important to the United States if independent; they would take our breadstuffs, to a certain extent, and would supply us with indigo, cocoa, and coffee; and, being near us, we might, and probably would participate in carrying for them; and, as Mexico has no good port on the Atlantic, and produces much sugar, we should send our vessels there in ballast, purchase with bills of exchange, or carry, on freight, for the native merchants. England and France would, however, enjoy all the great advantages of their independence; for those two nations manufacture or produce all the articles necessary for their consumption. Our merchants might supply them with nankeens, and, in part, with India cottons. On the whole, I should consider the independence of the Spanish Main of considerable importance, particularly to our navigation. Mexico must depend on others for ships; she has no good port near us, and, therefore, cannot well become a navigating people.

La Plata, the Speaker says is quite too remote to supply the West Indies, for that it required sixty-four days for a vessel, just arrived at Baltimore, to make her passage. The Speaker is certainly out of his reckoning; vessels actually pass by the West Indies. And he has forgot, that vessels from La Plata will have the trade winds a great part of their passage to the West Indies, and may fairly calculate on making the islands in thirty-six days, or forty days at the most. They may supply Brazil, Cayenne, and Surinam, in a shorter time than we can, and certainly can supply Spain, Portugal, and the Mediterranean, as easy and on as low a freight as we can from the United States; their voyages to the East Indies will be much shorter—they will be performed in sixty or seventy days; and, being near the precious metals, they will be able to carry on the trade beyond the Cape of Good Hope on better terms than we can. But, Chili, he says, is wholly too remote to interfere with us. The Speaker sneers at the idea of Chili supplying breadstuffs; yet, it is well known, that, during the last year, some American vessels actually brought cargoes of wheat from Chili, around Cape Horn, to Brazils, and tended thereby to reduce the price of American flour in those markets. But, Mr. Chairman, I am as desirous as the Speaker is to see those provinces free and independent. The great and immediate advantages will, it is certain, be to England, France, and the Hanse Towns; yet we shall derive some advantage from the general benefit resulting to the trade of the world by their freedom and independence.

The Speaker thinks there is no great use for a Minister at the Court of Brazil, for that the trade of that kingdom is of little consequence to the United States, not so much, he thinks, as La Plata. I differ entirely with the Speaker on that point. The Brazils supply us with sugar and other articles, and we pay in flour and other commodities; but the King of Brazil is also King of Portugal, which nation has always been one of our very best customers, for wheat, flour, rice, and particularly for Indian corn; we also supply Portugal with fish, rice, staves, and naval stores, and get in return specie, salt, wine, lemons, &c. The principal part of the salt used by the people of the United States for our fish, beef, and pork, is drawn from Portugal.

The Speaker has told us, that the importance of the commerce of a nation depends on its extent of population and territory. This, sir, is novel to me; all history differs from the Speaker. Tyre is a small island, and had some little territory, yet her people, owing to its government, were, in their time, the great, the most celebrated traders of the world. Carthage possessed little territory, or population, yet she carried on an immense traffic. Venice, Genoa, and Pisa, were all very small States, with no great population, yet were they all greatly commercial. Portugal, a small kingdom, with perhaps two millions of people, discovered the Indus and China, and surprised the world by her immense commerce. Portugal fell into the power of Spain, and the commerce of India was, in consequence, wrested from her by Holland, who had little of territory, and an inconsiderable population. China and Russia are the greatest Powers on earth as to population and extent of territory, yet neither has ever been considered great in commerce.

The Speaker has adverted to a letter from Buenos Ayres, which appeared in a Baltimore paper, received yesterday, and has asked, who is the writer? What his character? And what his politics? And has answered, that it is probably some Spaniard, hostile to the patriots. I am informed, that he is an American of fair character, and very friendly to the patriotic cause, and that his information may be relied upon.

The Speaker has alluded to a pamphlet lately published by a merchant in Philadelphia. I have only seen the outside of the pamphlet; it is said to be written by a gentleman who is not at present engaged in active business as a merchant, and, as far as I am informed, free from improper motives. I am told that it is worth the reading; but that gentleman, (the Speaker insinuates,) and other merchants, are governed in their opinions by the trade they carry on with Spain and her colonies; and this may be true, to a certain extent; they may honestly believe that it is bad policy to give up a trade substantially good, useful to themselves, and more so to the farmers of the country; they know that, at present, they export to Spain and her colonies about two hundred thousand barrels of flour, (being one-seventh of all we do export,) rice, cotton, fish, naval stores, Indian corn, lumber, furniture, nails, boots, shoes, hats, tobacco, East India goods, nankeens, &c., to the amount of nearly eight and a half millions; that, of that sum, four and a half millions is the produce and manufacture of the United States, being a greater amount than is exported to any other nation, except Great Britain and France, all of which (or nearly all) is carried in our own vessels, thus employing as many tons of our own ships as are employed even in our trade with Great Britain, and infinitely more than with any other nation. It may be proper again to state the fact, that Spain, being cut off from her usual supply of tobacco from the colonies, has been under the necessity of opening her ports to our tobacco; that her people give a decided preference to the tobacco of Kentucky, for which they give two dollars per 100 wt. more than any other; they consume no Maryland tobacco; next to Kentucky, they prefer Virginia. In return for this large trade in exports, we import from Spain and her colonies the articles we most require for the consumption of our own country, to wit, specie, salt, wine, fruits, sugar, coffee, cocoa, molasses, mahogany, dye woods, cochineal, and a variety of other articles, to an amount of eight or ten millions of dollars annually; all of which is carried in our own vessels. We import from Cuba alone, annually, forty-five thousand hogsheads of molasses, requiring, perhaps, twenty thousand tons of shipping for its transport, all carried in vessels of the United States. Sir, the trade we have to Spain and her colonies is more advantageous than that with any other nation, England and France excepted. It enables the merchants to pay off, in part, the immense balance of trade in favor of Great Britain. Besides the trade to and from Spain and her colonies, a very considerable number of vessels of the United States are employed in carrying from Cuba sugar and coffee to the ports of Europe, and, in return, cargoes from Europe to Cuba. Is it, then, surprising, that the merchants of the United States should be willing to risk the loss of a trade so highly important to themselves, and so eminently useful to the agricultural interest of the United States, for a project which, no doubt, will appear to them a little visionary, and which would render little service to the patriots whom the motion professes to serve? What great use will our acknowledging the independence of La Plata be to the patriots? It will have a moral effect, we are told. Sir, I have not much confidence in that which is called moral effect; it is more of sound than substance. If we add physical force to a recognition, then I can comprehend its utility; if we send a fleet and army to their aid, as France did when she declared us to be an independent people, we might render them real and essential service; and if we did, what would our officers see? Why, sir, according to a paper just received, they would find the Executive Directory of La Plata making war, as the ally of the King of Portugal, against Artigas, who is chief of Oriental Banda, and who appears to be, in truth, "a republican;" a man with little education, but of strong mind and strong understanding; brave, active, intelligent; devoted to his country—possessing the entire confidence of the people of whom he is chief. That General has constantly kept the Portuguese confined in Montevideo; nor have they been able to remove him. He defeats them whenever they attempt to remove out of their fortress. We find that the officers of the royal Government of Portugal have obtained the aid of the Directory of La Plata—what for? To put down and destroy the Republican General Artigas. Permit me to read an article from a paper just received. Speaking of Buenos Ayres, the account states: "The present Government reigns with an iron rod—barbarism is the order of the day. But it will require all the vigilance they possess to stop the flame which is now arising, and which must burst forth with a rage unprecedented in this country." Again: "The attack made by these people (of La Plata) against General Artigas, has met the reward it merited; in the first attack they met with a loss of three hundred killed, and forty-seven prisoners, and one piece of artillery. Artigas is a brave, intelligent man, of little education, but of sound, solid judgment, adored by his army, and the people of his province, and I believe, is the only true republican in the country. He is now struggling against the combined efforts of the King of Portugal and his Government, (La Plata.) How must a republican feel when he hears people crying out down with all royalty, and at the same time assisting a drowned head in establishing its tyrannic domination over a free people?" Mr. Chairman, I vouch not for the truth of this information; but it bears such strong marks of authenticity, that I place confidence in it; and, I think, it ought to induce us to hesitate, and to decline any act that may implicate us in war, until we can be more correctly informed. We may obtain the necessary information on the return of our Commissioners; they are all favorable to the patriotic cause, and we ought to wait their report.

The Speaker ought to know that Portugal, when she first discovered the Brazils, claimed to the river of La Plata; that when she fell under the dominion of Philip, King of Spain, he established Montevideo; and, although the crown of Portugal was wrested from Spain by the Duke of Braganza, yet the Banda Oriental has ever since been held by Spain. The King of Portugal has taken advantage of the present situation of Spain; he has taken possession of Montevideo on his right; and is desirous of conquering the whole of the Oriental Banda. Artigas has, as yet, successfully prevented the conquest; the King of Portugal, it would appear, is unequal to the object, and has prevailed on the Supreme Directory of La Plata to assist him, and we find the troops of republican La Plata making war, as an ally of the King of Portugal and Brazils, to conquer the brave and valiant Republican General Artigas. Sir, I conclude with the expression of an opinion, that it is prudent for our Government to wait until we have information, such as we can safely rely upon.

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) again spoke in rejoinder to the gentlemen who had replied to his last speech. After a few prefatory remarks—the gentleman from Georgia, said Mr. C., tells us, and I am now rejoiced to hear it, that his heart is with us; that his feelings are all on the patriotic side.

Our condition is peculiar; the hearts of gentlemen, in opposition to this motion, are with us—but I am afraid we shall find a great number of their votes against us. Yes, sir, State rights—take care of them! Personal liberty—let that take care of itself!

The honorable gentleman has been pleased to refer to an observation of mine respecting the division of parties, on which I would observe, that he has not done me justice. A gentleman from Virginia was the first to introduce that topic, and my remarks were in reply to him only. The gentleman from Georgia, the other day, was pleased to take notice of remarks which had appeared in certain newspapers, in which I did not follow his example. If I had chosen to have done so, I could have taken notice of some denunciations which had been thrown out against myself. But, sir, those scribblers know little of the firm purpose of my soul, if they suppose it is to be shaken by such assaults. No, sir, it was not myself, but the gentleman from Virginia, who presented himself as the champion of the Executive, who took a view of the present question, connected with the divisions of parties. I see nothing in it but a difference of opinion on a particular question, among those who generally act together. It is for those who oppose us to take their course; what that course may be, is to me utterly immaterial.

The gentleman from Maryland, Mr. C. went on to say, was as unfortunate in his practical information, as he was in regard to public law; having mistaken the cause of war by Great Britain against France, during our Revolution, which was not for having recognised us, but for having given us aid. The gentleman was equally unfortunate, Mr. C. said, in replying to his position in regard to foreign commerce, which was not that a small State might not carry on an extensive commerce; for, against that position, Great Britain, whose European possessions were of no great extent, would have been a striking example. What I did observe, said Mr. C., was, that, as to such Powers as South America, the value of their commerce was to be inferred from the extent of the territory or population. The gentleman says, that he is incapable of appreciating the effect of moral causes. Sir, I did not ascribe to him that faculty; but I should have supposed that the gentleman's recollection should have taught him how the heart beat when our independence was acknowledged by foreign Powers, and how like causes would produce like effects. The gentleman had told the Committee of information from Buenos Ayres, that Pueyrredon is carrying on affairs with a high hand. The correctness of this information, Mr. C. said, he doubted very much. The authority of Pueyrredon, he said, was very much like that of the President of the United States; he was a responsible officer, and, instead of putting down the liberty of the press, he answered the calumniators who attacked him, by the wisdom and vigor of his administration, &c. In respect to the letter from Buenos Ayres, which had been spoken of, Mr. C.

said, he had heard, that the author of that letter, or a similar one, was a nephew of Carrera, the nature of whose views Mr. C. said, he had shown; that Carrera, who sought, on the ruins of Chilian liberty, to erect the fabric of his own ambition, &c. Mr. C. said, he knew nothing of the authority of the gentleman who had been referred to in the debate, as the author of some information from that quarter. Be he who he may, said he, I say again, I wish to see it authenticated by the signature of "Charles Thompson."

Mr. C. remarked, in conclusion, as to the object of his motion, that if the clause were inserted in the bill which he proposed, it would impose on the Executive no obligation, but put it in the power of the President to apply the sum to the purpose specified, whenever he chose to do so, if the Senate thought proper to consent to it.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, again rose.—The Speaker, said he, has said, that the moral effect produced on the United States by France, when she recognised our independence, filled all hearts with exultation and joy. Mr. Chairman, I well remember the time, and will tell the Speaker what caused our joy. It was, that the capture of Burgoyne's army had been the cause that induced France to acknowledge our independence. (See King Louis's letter to the King of Spain) and that at the same time that he informed our Government of his recognition, he assured them, that he would send a fleet and army to our assistance. He did so; and, by their noble aid, we secured our independence sooner than we otherwise should have done. If he had not sent physical aid, the moral effect would have done us little good, and we should have laughed at it.

Mr. H. NELSON said it was with great reluctance he rose to address the House again, because he was scarcely competent to make himself heard; but the honorable Speaker had dealt his blows so liberally around, that it was impossible to sit still and tamely bear them. The gentleman introduces me, said Mr. N., as the champion of the Executive. Did I ever so announce myself in this House? so far from it I have explicitly disclaimed it. But, in the same breath in which this charge is made on me, the Speaker informs the House, that he is the advocate for enlarging the Executive patronage, and that we are desirous to control and limit the power of the Executive. I rise now, sir, to claim for myself the character of the champion of liberty, and to protest against the assumption of exclusive right to that character by the Speaker. Having no disposition to trespass on the patience of the House, Mr. N. said he would pass over much he had to say, and come to a particular point. Why, he asked, had the honorable Speaker presented Carrera in an odious light to the Committee and to the nation, as an ambitious, intriguing man? Has the Speaker, said he, any information of an authentic character which we do not possess? He denies credit to information received from respectable Americans at Buenos Ayres, and wants to see "Charles Thompson" to it. And who, sir, is his Charles Thompson? Billy Duane; from whose paper he read the matter he quoted to the House as authority. I hold in my hand a document equally entitled to respect with any which the gentleman read to the House—a letter from a friend of Carrera to a gentleman in this country, dated in September last. This man came here to obtain supplies for his country, and did everything he could to serve it. He was arrested at Buenos Ayres, thrown into a dungeon, his property taken from him and disposed of by this immaculate Pueyrredon. This letter was from an eyewitness, who had seen and felt the tyranny of the Supreme Director. And by whom had the virtuous Carrera been arrested? By a scoundrel who, it now plainly appeared, was destroying the rights of his own country by his tyranny and filling his coffers with the spoils of any of his own people, who dared to raise their voice against his tyranny and oppression. Mr. N. also quoted a letter from Chili, dated in July, 1817, speaking of the distracted and unsettled state of that country. [Mr. N. was here obliged to suspend his remarks, his broken voice rendering him unable to proceed.]

Mr. CLAY rejoined. I am charged, said he, with saying that those who are the friends of this proposition are the exclusive friends of liberty. I made no such unjust remark. I said, if the gentleman went away from us, he might, perhaps, in his new political connexion find consolation for the separation from his old friends, who march on in the path of liberty. Sir, the galled jade winces. My quotations, the gentleman says, were from Billy Duane. How does the gentleman know that? [Mr. NELSON said, across the House, that he saw the paper in the gentleman's hands.] I quoted principally from the National Intelligencer, said Mr. C.—others of my quotations were from historical works. The manifesto of July last, I quoted from the Aurora; I am sorry it was not in the Intelligencer; it was as worthy of publication as the speech of the Prince Regent or the King of France. I should like to know whence the gentleman who questions the sources of my information got the letters he has just produced to the House—from what bureau? But, sir, I will not recriminate.

Mr. H. NELSON said, he should like to know what the honorable Speaker meant, when he spoke of the galled jade wincing. When I spoke of the paper which the gentleman quoted as authority, it was because I saw it in his hands. Those letters which I have quoted were addressed to a private gentleman in Georgetown, and by him to me; and as much entitled to credit as any authority the Speaker has produced.

The debate here terminated; and, the question being taken, by yeas and nays, on agreeing to the proposition of Mr. CLAY to insert in the general appropriation bill a provision for an outfit and one year's salary for a Minister to the United Provinces of La Plata, it was decided in the negative.—For the motion 45, against it 115.

The House then proceeded to the other clauses of the appropriation bill.

The first clause which came under consideration was that of — dollars for the salaries, expenses, &c., of the commissions under the 5th, 6th, and 7th articles of the Treaty of Ghent.

This clause gave rise to some debate.

Mr. CLARK first took exception to the appropriation, on the ground of the unexpected amount of the expenses of these commissions. In this view of the subject, he was supported by Messrs. HOLMES of Massachusetts, and PITKIN. Mr. LOWDES, as Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, did not justify all the expenditure, but showed that a considerable part of it was unavoidable.

The principal item of expense objected to, was the charge for expenses of the commission, in addition to the salaries which gentlemen supposed were to have covered also the expenses of living of the commissioners, agent, &c. It was further objected that the number of officers employed by the commissioners was too large, and their compensation too great, there being two secretaries instead of one, and private secretaries, besides several surveyors, and the salary of the agents, being $4,444. It was also objected that the course of proceeding of the Northern commission (the expenses of which were principally objected to) had been more minutely particular than a due execution of the object of the commission required, and that it ought to be expedited. These objections were stated as the ground for a delay of the appropriation for this head of expenditure, until a minute investigation could be made, by the committee who have the subject specially confided to their investigation.

The discussion resulted in a partial appropriation for the expenses under these articles of the British treaty; and in restricting the salary of the agents to $3,000, notwithstanding the objection of Mr. BALDWIN and others, that, as one-half of the expenses were to be paid by each Government, the salaries of our officers ought certainly to be as large as those of the British officers of the same description.

The Committee then rose, and reported the appropriation bill, with the amendments which had been made; and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, March 30.

Mr. POINTEUX presented a petition of the General Assembly of the State of Mississippi, praying that an act may be passed granting to all persons in said territory, who have, or may forfeit, their lands, for nonpayment of the purchase money, on or before the 1st day of May, 1819, the right of pre-emption in the purchase of the lands by them forfeited, respectively.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. LOWDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the bill from the Senate to increase the salaries of certain officers of the Government, with some amendments, [making the bill take effect from the first of April next, instead of January last, and striking out the appropriation contained in the bill, leaving it to be provided for in the general annual appropriation bill.] which, together with the bill, were committed to a Committee of the whole House.

Mr. SEYBERT, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Martin Warner," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-day; which was consequently done, and the bill passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House papers referred to in the report of the Secretary of State of the 14th instant, accompanying the Message of the President of that date, on the subject of our affairs with Spain, embracing an immense volume of correspondence between our Government and the Minister of Spain antecedent to that communicated on the 14th, and sundry other papers, transmitted to the House by the Secretary of State in obedience to instruction from the President of the United States. The papers were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the resolution "respecting an adjournment of the first session of the Fifteenth Congress," with an amendment, in which they ask the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed bills of the following titles, to wit:

An act declaring the consent of Congress to an act of the State of North Carolina, for the relief of sick and disabled American seamen;

An act for the relief of Louis and Antoine Dequindue;

An act for the relief of the president, directors, and company of the Merchants' bank of Newport, in Rhode Island; and Resolution directing medals to be struck, and, together with the thanks of Congress, presented to Major General Harrison and Governor Shelby, and for other purposes; in which last mentioned bills and resolution, they ask the concurrence of this House.

The bills from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the president, directors, and company of the Merchants' Bank of Newport, in Rhode Island;" and "An act for the relief of Louis and Antoine Dequindue," were severally read twice, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act declaring the consent of Congress to an act of the State of North Carolina, for the relief of sick and disabled seamen," was read twice, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

The resolution from the Senate, "directing medals to be struck, and, together with the thanks of Congress, presented to Major General Harrison and Governor Shelby, and for other purposes," was read twice, and ordered to be read a third time to-day. The resolution was, accordingly, read a third time, and passed.

The joint resolution sent to the Senate from this House, fixing on the 13th proximo for the adjournment of the session, having been returned from the Senate with an amendment, substituting the 20th of April for the 13th—

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved the indefinite postponement of the resolution, but subsequently withdrew his motion; when

Mr. BEECHER moved that the resolution lie on the table, which motion was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays—yeas 41, nays 111; and the amendment of the Senate was then agreed to without a division.

GOVERNMENT CLERKS.

Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, from the committee appointed to inquire whether any, and what, clerks or other officers in either of the departments, or in any office at the Seat of Government, have conducted themselves improperly in their official duties, made a long report embracing a particular detail of facts touching the conduct of several clerks, accompanied by a voluminous mass of papers, containing evidence, &c., and concluding with the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to prohibit the clerks in the several departments from acting as agents for claimants against the United States.

2. Resolved, That it is expedient to prohibit the clerks in the several departments from engaging in the business of trade.

3. Resolved, That the several acts relating to the Treasury Department should be amended and certain penalties increased.

4. Resolved, That a committee be appointed to report a bill or bills to carry into effect the above resolutions.

The report was ordered to be printed, and—after a few remarks from Mr. LOWDES, who, without in the least questioning the correctness of the object of the committee, suggested whether the present course was proper, which would in effect, cast censure on the heads of the departments for permitting these irregularities, when it was known, and he presumed to the committee also, that the Executive departments had for some time had this subject under consideration, and were engaged in applying remedies to the irregularities referred to by the committee—the resolutions were severally agreed to, and a committee was appointed accordingly; and Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. T. M. NELSON, Mr. REED, Mr. SOUTHWARD, Mr. TALLMADGE, and Mr. CAMPBELL, were appointed the committee.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, from the committee to whom was referred that part of the President's Message relating to roads, and canals, and seminaries of learning, reported the following resolutions, which were, on motion of Mr. BASSETT, ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to lay before this House at the ensuing session of Congress, and report a plan for the application of such means as are within the power of Congress, to the purpose of opening and constructing such roads and canals as may deserve and require the aid of the Government, with a view to military operations in time of war, the transportation of munitions of war, and to the more complete defence of the United States. And also a statement of the works of the nature above mentioned, which have been commenced, the progress which has been made, and the means and prospect of their completion, together with such information as in the opinion of the Secretary shall be material in relation to the objects of this resolution.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to prepare and report to this House at their next session a plan for the application of such means as are within the power of Congress to the purpose of opening and improving roads and making canals, together with a statement of the undertakings of that nature, which, as objects of public improvement, may require and deserve the aid of the Government; and also a statement of works of the nature above mentioned, which have been commenced, the progress which has been made in them, the means and prospect of their being completed, the public improvements carried on by States, or by companies, or incorporations, which have been associated for such purposes, to which it may be deemed expedient to subscribe or afford assistance, the terms and conditions of such associations, and the state of their funds, and such information as, in the opinion of the Secretary, shall be material in relation to the objects of this resolution.

HISTORY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, from the committee appointed on the petition of Gales & Seaton, made a report thereon, which was read; when Mr. R. reported a bill authorizing a subscription to the History of Congress, which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill to provide for the publication of the laws of the United States, and for other purposes. The report is as follows:

The committee to whom was referred the memorial of Gales & Seaton, report: That the memorialists are engaged in publishing a history of the Congress of the United States, from the commencement of the Government to the present day, and a continuation of the same history, to keep pace with the present and future transactions of that body. The memorialists solicit the aid of the Government in this their laborious and expensive undertaking. The committee are fully impressed with the importance of this work. Nothing can be more useful than a correct legislative history of the United States. It is a source of much regret that one has not heretofore existed; and now, that it is proposed to be published, there can be no hesitation in giving it encouragement. The views and opinions of the great actors on the theatre of government, are not less necessary to be known than their acts themselves. The utility of judicial reports is very generally admitted; and if the reasons of the judge ought to accompany his exposition of the law, how much more proper is it that this should be the case in respect to the views of the legislator, the author of the law itself. To a right understanding of statutes, nothing is more essential than a knowledge of the causes and motives which produced their enactment; and this can in no way be so satisfactorily obtained as by a resort to contemporaneous debate.

That the aid of Congress is necessary to this work, arises out of the great labor and expense attending it, whilst, at the same time, no adequate remuneration can be expected from its sale. The agriculturist, the merchant, the mechanic, and the physician, who purchase other books, will feel comparatively but little interest in this, however useful it may be to the politician, the historian, and the law-giver. The work will not afford amusement to the general reader; but without it the archives of the nation are defective.

Congress has not been backward in giving aid to publications of a similar character. Of the new edition of the laws of the United States, a subscription was directed of one thousand copies, before the work was commenced. Three or four hundred have been since purchased of that work, and it is now proposed to purchase eight hundred copies more. A subscription was, in like manner, authorized to Wait's edition of the public documents, and it is further proposed to purchase an equal number of copies of an additional volume of that work, about to be published. The policy is not less just than liberal, which provides for the widest attainable diffusion of whatever concerns the development of the springs and principles of our Government.

With such views it is, that at the present session, the publication of the journals of the Convention, and of the secret journal of the old Congress, has been authorized; and, with such views, the committee ask leave to report a bill "authorizing a subscription to the History of Congress."

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then took up and proceeded to consider the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole to the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1818; which amendments were severally concurred in without debate, with the exception of that making an appropriation of $130,000 to pay the judgment of damages recovered against David Gelston and Peter A. Schenck, in the supreme court of New York, by Gould Hoyt, for the seizure of the vessel the American Eagle.

Messrs. HOPKINSON, BALDWIN, LIVERMORE, and MERCER opposed, and Messrs. LOWNDES, SMITH of Maryland, and SPENCER, supported the appropriation. The opponents contended that the claimants were not entitled to relief, because they seized the vessel on their own responsibility; because they did not take the proper steps to appeal from the decision of the district court refusing a certificate that the seizure was made on probable cause; and because, as they would derive a benefit from the forfeiture, if one had been decreed, they ought to submit to the consequence of an improper seizure. It was answered, that the claimants had refused to seize until peremptorily directed by the Executive; that the proceedings were then in the hands of the law officers of the Government, over whom the claimants had no control, and they could not direct an appeal to the superior courts; that such appeal would have been useless, as there was a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in another case, confirming the decision of the district court, that St. Domingo was not a prince or state, within the meaning of the act of 1794; that an appeal would have involved greater expense unnecessarily; that the claimants, not being the informers, it was doubtful whether they would have derived any advantage from a condemnation; and that at all events it was shown from the documents, that such an expectation did not influence them. Mr. HOPKINSON mentioned that money had been drawn from the Treasury and paid to the sureties of the claimants, and he would not sanction such an act by passing the present law. To this Mr. LOWNDES answered, by producing a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, from which it appeared that the rules of the court of errors in New York required security to be given before a writ of error could be brought upon the judgment rendered against the claimants; and that Mr. Gelston had deposited $125,000 in a bank, to the credit of his sureties, out of moneys collected by him; and that it had been stated in his quarterly accounts regularly ever since. Many other incidental points arose. The clause finally passed by a vote of 60 to 59.

The amendments having been gone through—

Mr. FORSYTH moved to strike out the specific appropriation of $30,000 to pay the mission to South America, and to add the $30,000 to the contingent fund.

Mr. F. remarked, in explanation of his motion, that the specific appropriation supposed that the persons sent by the President were official characters; as such, it was necessary that their appointments should be submitted to the Senate. They would be considered in the light of Ministers of some grade, sent to a foreign Government, and not agents appointed under the discretion of the Executive to acquire information. The practice of all former times required the payment to be made out of the contingent fund, whose expenditure was trusted wholly to Executive discretion. The recognition of such unofficial agents, and a specific appropriation to pay them, would be to establish a precedent for the most extensive abuses—abuses which could not well be committed by expenditures out of the contingent fund. He believed there was little difference of opinion as to the propriety of the course adopted by the Government, and none to the appropriation of the necessary funds to meet its views. He supposed that his motion would prevail without difficulty, and reconcile every possible objection to that part of the appropriation bill.

Mr. LOWNDES signified his approbation of Mr. FORSYTH's proposition; and

The motion was agreed to without opposition.

SPANISH AMERICAN PROVINCES.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kentucky, then rose and renewed the proposition unsuccessfully made in Committee of the Whole by Mr. CLAY, to appropriate a sum not exceeding $18,000 "for an outfit and one year's salary of a Minister to the United Provinces of the River Plata, the outfit to be paid and the salary to commence whenever the President shall deem it expedient to send a Minister to the Government of the said provinces."

Mr. ANDERSON made this motion not with an idea of a different result, but in consideration of the great importance of the question, on which it was desirable to have the vote recorded, with which view he asked for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPENCER observed that he would trespass on the indulgence of the House but a few moments. It is not my intention, said Mr. S., to discuss the merits of this proposition. After the wonderful ability which it has already called forth; after the splendid blaze of eloquence which has been poured upon the subject, I have not the vanity to suppose that I can throw any new light upon it. But some ideas have been avowed in the debate, and some insinuations have been made which render it proper and necessary for me to state the reasons which induce the vote I shall give in favor of the amendment. It has been said by one gentleman that the passage of this amendment would be a censure upon the Executive. And, pray sir, if it were, does that alter the case? Are we assembled here to vote according to the wishes of the President? or, have we a duty of our own to perform? As one, sir, so long as I hold a seat on this floor, it shall be my peculiar object to watch the Executive branch of the Government—not the individual, but the acts of that branch. To us, and to us only, is he responsible, according to the provisions of the Constitution.

Another gentleman has, however, carried this idea much further. He (Mr. H. NELSON, of Virginia,) tells us that this proposition is the signal for a new formation of parties, and is intended to denounce the President. Sorry I am, sir, to hear such groundless alarms rung to prevent the adoption of this measure. Denounce the President! Why, sir, you may as well expect the pigmy to denounce the giant. Look at the present incumbent of the Executive Chair; besides the usual influence of his office; besides his almost unbounded patronage, his power of bestowing an office here and a contract there; he possesses a popularity and an influence at this moment, which was never equalled by any other man, excepting the Father of his Country, in the first years of his Administration. And who is to denounce him? The House of Representatives: a body without power, without influence, and so far from being popular, that it is notoriously the branch of the Government most frequently calumniated. When these are put in opposition, and it is said that the weak, the imbecile, is denouncing the man mighty in strength; the malevolent might infer that the remark was intended as a caution to the pigmy, how he exposed himself to the wrath of the giant. But, sir, let me inform you and the gentleman who made the remark, that such menaces have no terrors for me. The path of duty lies plainly before me, and I shall not be deterred from pursuing it by any apprehensions of danger from any source.

But the imagination of the gentleman is affected with the dread of the formation of a new party. Let him dismiss his fears, sir, at least until he finds us coalescing with our old opponents; as one, sir, I disavow any such feeling, any such motive. I claim to belong to the old Republican party of this country; I was nurtured in its bosom, I have grown with its growth, and strengthened with its strength, and I shall be the last man to attempt its division. I will enlist under the banners of no man; I adopt as my maxim, in the fullest extent, the motto of the present President, "principia non homines," principles, not men. I shall adhere to the Republican majority, so long as it adheres to the principles on which it was formed, and upon which it triumphed, but not one step further will I go, with any man or with any party.

But so far from the present proposition being a censure on the Executive, my belief is, that from every public act or declaration of his, with which we are acquainted, we are justified in inferring that it will be consonant to his views. It cannot be necessary to travel over this ground again, after it has been so well explored by my friend from Massachusetts (Mr. HOLMES.) The proposition is simply to give the President the means of sending a Minister to the Government of Buenos Ayres, whenever it shall, in his opinion, be expedient to do so. I would not now send a Minister there; I would certainly wait for one to be first sent to us from that Government, and prudence also would dictate some delay until more certain intelligence was received from there. But I am anxious to evince to the world, and to the suffering patriots who are struggling in the noble cause of liberty, our desire to seize the very first opportunity to hail them as brethren. That the President possesses the same feeling, the same anxiety, is, I think, evident from every page of his message, and of the correspondence. Let us then, by our acts, exhibit the same ardor, and, as far as we are able, animate our suffering brethren in their glorious struggle for independence.

The proposition before us, is now made; it will be known to the world, to Spain, and to Spanish America. It must be adopted or rejected. If successful, I need not repeat the beneficial consequences, which have already been so eloquently described. If it be rejected, ask gentlemen to reflect whether that event will not wear an aspect of unkindness; I will not say of hostility to the cause, because every gentleman who has yet expressed his sentiments, has declared them to be warmly and strongly in favor of that cause; but, I repeat the question, whether it will not have the appearance of indifference?

But, sir, I vote for this proposition on another ground. I believe most firmly that we have the Constitutional power to legislate on this and every other subject connected with our foreign relations, or with the regulation of commerce. I hold it to be a power concurrent with that of the Executive branch, and believing it to be one of the most important which this House possesses, I would make a perpetual claim to the right on every proper occasion, and I would place it on the records of the nation as an eternal evidence of that claim.

Since then, no injury can flow from its adoption, because it will still be left to the Executive discretion; but on the contrary, much good is confidently anticipated; and, since its rejection may depress that cause for which we all profess so much attachment, let us advance and share with the Executive that responsibility which now rests with him, and which must, in any event chiefly continue with him.

When Mr. SPENCER concluded—

The question was taken on the motion, and decided, in the negative, by yeas and nays, by exactly the same vote as decided the question in Committee of the Whole, viz: yeas 45, nays 115, as follows:

TUESDAY, March 31.

Mr. SEBERT, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, made unfavorable reports on the several petitions of the manufacturers of looking-glasses in frames, and carvers and gilders of wood; on the petitions of the merchants, traders, and tailors, of Boston and Philadelphia, and on the petition of Wheeler and Cook; which reports were read, and severally concurred in.

which was read the first and second time, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the same committee, to which was referred the bills from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Cata Bunnell;" and "An act regulating the staff of the army;" reported the said bills without amendment.

On motion of Mr. PITKIN, a committee was appointed to join such gentlemen as may be appointed by the Senate, to take into consideration, and report what business is necessary to be acted upon before the close of the present session; and Messrs. The bill for the relief of Joseph Thorn, passed through a Committee of the whole House, and was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill of this House, entitled an "Act for the relief of Daniel Burnet, Gibson Clark, and the legal representatives of Hubert Rowel," with an amendment; and they have also passed a bill, entitled "An act supplemental to the act, entitled 'An act further to amend the charter of the City of Washington,'" in which amendment and bill they ask the concurrence of this House.

THE CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The orders of the day being announced, on the bill making appropriations; the first, of $52,984, to pay the claims now due at the Treasury; and the second, of $260,000, to meet the demands that will be made under existing contracts, towards completing the Cumberland road—

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, rose, and moved that the Committee of the whole House be discharged from the consideration of the bill, and that it be postponed indefinitely.

This motion brought on a short debate on the merits of the bill; in which the postponement was advocated by the mover, by Mr. BASSETT, and Mr. LIVERMORE; and opposed by Messrs. TUCKER of Virginia, HARRISON, TARR, PINDALL, BEECHER, TRIMBLE, MERCER, and SMITH, of Maryland.

The question on postponing the bill was finally negatived—yeas 56, nays 82, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Austin, Barbour of Virginia, Bassett, Bellinger, Bennett, Boden, Burwell, Butler, Clagett, Claiborne, Cook, Crafts, Cruger, Drake, Earle, Edwards, Ellicott, Gage, Garnett, Hall of Delaware, Hall of North Carolina, Hasbrouck, Herkimer, Hogg, Hunter, Huntington, Johnson of Virginia, Lawyer, Livermore, McCoy, Mason of Rhode Island, Merrill, Hugh Nelson, Palmer, Rhea, Richards, Sampson, Savage, Scudder, Settle, Shaw, Silsbee, J. S. Smith, Spencer, Strong, Strother, Tallmadge, Tompkins, Townsend, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Wendover, Williams of New York, Williams of North Carolina, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Wilson of Pennsylvania.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson of Pa., Anderson of Kentucky, Baldwin, Bateman, Bayley, Beecher, Bloomfield, Campbell, Cobb, Colston, Comstock, Crawford, Culbreth, Cushman, Darlington, Desha, Ervin of South Carolina, Forsyth, Hale, Harrison, Herbert, Herrick, Heister, Hitchcock, Holmes of Massachusetts, Holmes of Connecticut, Hopkinson, Irving of New York, Johnson of Kentucky, Jones, Kinsey, Linn, Little, Lowndes, Marchand, Mason of Massachusetts, Mercer, Middleton, Moore, Moseley, Murray, Jeremiah Nelson, Ogden, Ogle, Parrott, Patterson, Pawling, Pindall, Pitkin, Pleasants, Poindexter, Reed, Rich, Ringgold, Robertson of Louisiana, Rogers, Ruggles, Sawyer, Schuyler, Sergeant, Seybert, Sherwood, Simkins, Slocumb, S. Smith, Ballard Smith, Speed, Stewart of North Carolina, Stuart of Maryland, Tarr, Taylor, Terrill, Terry, Trimble, Tucker of Virginia, Upham, Wallace, Westerlo, Whiteside, Whitman, and Williams of Connecticut.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the above bill.

Mr. BASSETT moved to strike out the second section of the bill, appropriating $260,000 to meet the demands that will be made under existing contracts for carrying on the work, and spoke in support of his motion.

The motion was advocated, and the bill opposed, also, by Mr. CLAIBORNE; and the bill supported, and the motion opposed, by Messrs. TUCKER, of Virginia, HARRISON, BEECHER, SIMKINS, and CLAY; and with particular zeal and earnestness by the last-named gentleman.

Mr. SIMKINS, of South Carolina, said: I rise,

Mr. Chairman, with no view to enter into an elaborate or minute discussion of the question before the Committee; for to re-discuss the constitutionality of a subject so intimately connected with the one so lately and ably examined in this House, would be a waste of time, and a trespass upon the indulgence of the members. I rise principally to say that I shall vote for the great work contemplated by the bill, not merely because it is begun, and the faith of the Government pledged by contracts with individuals actually made by the President, but because it is a national work, and one of great utility to the Western country generally, and to several of the Atlantic States; and here, Mr. Chairman, permit me to enter my solemn protest against a spirit of partial sectional legislation in this House. If this is not the case, why do we hear the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BASSETT) asking if this House intends to tax his constituents and the whole continent, for a road constructed for the State of Ohio? Does the gentleman come here to legislate for his particular district (except in mere local matters, in which I admit we ought especially to represent our constituents,) and will he not extend his views beyond it, or the State from which he comes? Yes, Mr. Chairman, when we come here, we ought to bring along with us general and extended views: and I should deem myself unworthy to fill the station assigned me by a very respectable portion of Americans (my constituents) if, when I entered this Hall, I did not elevate my mind and extend my exertions to national purposes, and national objects. In voting, therefore, I will not always ask the question, is South Carolina to be exclusively, or more signally benefited by the measure proposed, than any other State? Such a contracted view would lead to little sectional jealousies and to legislate for holes and corners, instead of for a great and rising Federal Union. This road, cut through the Alleghany Mountains, runs from the heart of Maryland (the city of Baltimore) through that State, Pennsylvania, and to Wheeling, in the State of Ohio, forming a grand, useful and easy pass from the centre of the Union to the fertile and now populous regions of the Western country. It is a part of that grand scheme of internal improvements, which will adorn and enrich our nation, and cement, fraternize, and consolidate the various parts of our varied and increasing continent.

But the gentleman from New York (Mr. SPENCER) who moved indefinitely to postpone this bill, as well as the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. LIVERMORE) are averse from doing anything, unless a great system of internal improvement is undertaken at once. This is not my mode of thinking; for if it is inexpedient, for want of money, or other causes, to do all, I am not for neglecting that which is most important, and can be accomplished. I would therefore appropriate to that object, most imperiously demanded by the general interest, in the first place, and proceed to others next in rank, as funds, and other concurring circumstances should warrant. As a South Carolinian, I would lend my aid to further the work in question, under the firm assurance that a correspondent liberality of spirit would induce honorable members to give us also a great pass-way from the South, immediately into the Western country, or a canal projected and thought entirely practicable by the ablest men amongst us, leading along the Atlantic coast, and forming a grand communication from North to South, for internal commerce and transportation, when we may be cut off from all foreign supplies.

Let the gentleman from New York then, not be discouraged, as he may expect, at a convenient period, to receive these same testimonies of national munificence towards the great and laudable plan of that State, to connect the Lakes with her great expository of commerce. In short, every part of the Union may and will eventually feel the signal advantages of this system, without any additional burdens upon the people, (for our wealth in land, some of which are set apart for these purposes, is inexhaustible;) a system too extensive to be accomplished by any single State, and which is therefore necessarily devolved on the whole Union.

I am therefore, said Mr. S., in favor of the bill, not only because the work is actually undertaken, in considerable forwardness, and the faith of the Government pledged by contracts already made towards it, but upon the general principles which I have endeavored to explain.

Mr. BASSETT's motion was lost—yeas 48, nays 61.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, moved to add the following as a new section to the bill:

"And be it further enacted, That, in the event of the incorporation of a company or companies by the Legislature of the State of Virginia, for the construction of a turnpike road from the said United States' road to Winchester in Virginia, the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is hereby authorized to subscribe, in the name and on behalf of the United States, for two-fifths of the capital stock in such company or companies: Provided, the residue of the stock be otherwise subscribed or taken, and the terms of incorporation in the opinion of the President of the United States are judicious and calculated to effect the object of such incorporation: And provided also, That a provision be made in such act of incorporation authorizing such subscription on the part of the United States."

This proposition was lost by a large majority; and then—

Mr. TARR moved an additional section, modified, with his consent, by Mr. BEECHER, to read as follows:

"Sec. 3. Be it further enacted, That to enable the President of the United States further to construct and complete the national road from Cumberland to the Ohio river, two hundred thousand dollars be and the same hereby is appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be repaid out of the fund reserved for laying out and making roads to the State of Ohio."

This amendment was strenuously advocated by Messrs. CLAY and PINDALL, and opposed briefly by Messrs. HOPKINSON and PITKIN, and earnestly by Mr. BALDWIN.

A motion to expunge from the amendment the word "national," was lost without a division; and the amendment itself then negatived—yeas forty-two.

Mr. BASSETT next moved to add to the second section the following proviso: "Provided, that nothing in this or any former law shall pledge the Government to any further appropriation;" which motion was negatived—only about twenty rising in its favor.

Mr. BALLARD SMITH, then, after some introductory and explanatory remarks moved the adoption of the following, as an additional section to the bill:

"And be it further enacted, That, in the event of the incorporation of a company or companies by the Legislature of the State of Virginia, for rendering navigable the James River, from the mouth of Sooney's Creek to the mouth of Dunlap's Creek, and for rendering navigable the Great Kenawha from its falls to its mouth, and for constructing a turnpike road from the mouth of Dunlap's Creek to the falls of the Great Kenawha, the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is hereby authorized to subscribe, in the name and on behalf of the United States, for two-fifths of the capital stock in such company or companies: Provided, the residue of the stock be otherwise subscribed or taken, and the terms of incorporation in the opinion of the President of the United States are judicious and calculated to effect the object of such incorporations: And provided also, That a provision be made in such act of incorporation authorizing such subscription on the part of the United States."

Mr. SMITH's proposition was negatived without a division; and the Committee then rose and reported the bill without amendment; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—yeas 67, nays 62.

WEDNESDAY, April 1.

The SPEAKER presented a representation of Manuel Torres, stating that he has discovered that the United States sustains great loss in the receipt and expenditure of the public revenue; and that he has also discovered the means by which this loss may be avoided, and offering to communicate his discovery upon the assurance of receiving a portion of the moneys which may be saved to the public by means of his said discovery.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of James Orr, which was read; when Mr. W. reported a bill for the relief of James Orr, which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of John G. Bogert," made a report recommending the rejection thereof. The bill and report were committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill for adjusting the claims to land, and establishing land offices in the districts east of the island of New Orleans; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill supplemental to the several acts for the adjustment of land claims in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act respecting the surveying and sale of the public lands in the Alabama Territory," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed.

Mr. RHEA, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill concerning invalid pensions; which was read twice.

Mr. SEYBERT, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, reported a bill to increase the duties on certain manufactured articles imported into the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SEYBERT, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of the piano-forte and organ builders of Philadelphia, New York, Boston, and Baltimore, of the New York State Company, of Thomas Tennant and George Stiles; which reports were severally concurred in by the House.

On motion, the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures were discharged from the further consideration of the resolution offered by Mr. SILSBEE on the 19th of December last, respecting the appropriations for building custom-houses.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made a report on the resolutions some time since submitted by Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, on the subject of the court martial upon Captain Perry and Captain Heath of the Marines. The report was long, with the statement of the opinion of the committee, that the defect was not in the law, but in the administration of it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, made several observations on the report; contending that if there had been any omission of duty on the part of any officers intrusted with the administration of the law, they ought to be brought to the notice of the House, and maintaining his original idea that the law was unequal and defective; and he submitted a resolution instructing the same committee to report a bill to deprive any officer who should strike his inferior officer, or draw or raise a weapon upon him, of his commission.

Mr. PLEASANTS made some remarks in explanation, and moved that the report and resolution be laid on the table and printed; which was carried without a division.

Bills of the Senate of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of Cata Bunnell; An act to regulate the fees of the public notaries in the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia; and An act to incorporate a Fire Insurance Company in the City of Washington, were severally read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported a bill to increase the allowance to Consuls on the Barbary coast, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Daniel Burnet, Gibson Clark, and the legal representatives of Hubert Rowel;" was read and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplemental to the act, entitled 'An act further to amend the charter of the City of Washington,'" was read and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Joseph Thorn," was read the third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act limiting the time for claims being produced for lands authorized to be granted to the inhabitants of New Madrid," and a resolution "requesting the President of the United States to present a sword to Colonel Richard M. Johnson;" in which bill and resolution they ask the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was read twice, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate "to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants and returning surveys thereon to the General Land Office, and for designating the western boundary line of the Virginia military tract."

Considerable discussion took place on the details of this bill, in which Messrs. H. NELSON, ANDERSON of Ky., HARRISON, CAMPBELL, MERCER, and BEECHER took part. Several amendments were adopted, the most important of which was one to prohibit the issuing of patents on locations made on lands to which the Indian title is not extinguished.

The amendments were reported to the House, ordered to be engrossed, and, with the bill, to be read a third time.

The House next resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill supplementary to the act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. MIDDLETON offered, by way of amendment, a substitute for the whole bill, which was agreed to, and, being reported to the House, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

The bill for the relief of George Pearson passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed.

HISTORY OF CONGRESS.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the bill providing for the publication of the laws of the United States; and on the bill authorizing a subscription to the History of Congress.

The details of the bill first named occupied some time, and gave rise to considerable discussion; and being gone through, the Committee took up the second bill.

Mr. BUTLER moved to strike out the first section of the bill, in support of which motion—

Mr. B. said he was unable to perceive that any great public advantage could result from having a History of Congress, and considered himself bound to oppose the passage of the bill. Judging from the specimen exhibited, he said, the history would embrace a considerable part of the Journals of Congress, which were already published, together with the numerous speeches, many of which had long since passed into oblivion—that a History of Congress from the commencement, including the present Congress, would make sixty volumes, calculating four volumes for each Congress, a thousand copies of which, at five dollars for each volume, would amount to three hundred thousand dollars to be paid by the Government. He said this might be supposed an extravagant calculation, but he believed no gentleman would say that the portion of the Journals to be selected, together with the speeches of each Congress, would comprise less than two volumes, and at that rate the expense which would accrue to the Government in publishing the History, would be one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. In opposing the passage of the bill, he said, he expected to encounter the eloquence of all the orators of the House, among whom he had not the vanity to expect to be classed. To such gentlemen it might be pleasing to read their own speeches, and see their names floating down the current of time in this great political ark, the History of Congress. If gentlemen were disposed to preserve some of the speeches in Congress, as specimens of pure eloquence, they might be published by subscription. And, in answer to the gentleman from Louisiana, (who said that Mr. B., from the specimen he had given, would figure in the History if he continued in Congress,) Mr. B. said, he had not the ability and much less an inclination, to figure in public debate; nor did he wish to excite in others that insatiable thirst for speaking, which had protracted the session to a great length. He said, he had a high respect for the talents and faithful services of the gentlemen who proposed publishing the History, and would most cheerfully aid them in the undertaking, by voting for a subscription on the part of the Government, if he could be satisfied that the utility of such a publication would justify so great an expenditure of public money.

Mr. BUTLER's motion, after some opposition from Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, was agreed to without a division, and the Committee rose, and reported their proceedings to the House.

The first bill was further amended, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and the report on the second was ordered to lie on the table.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

NEXT MEETING OF CONGRESS.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act fixing the time for the next meeting of Congress," was read the third time; and the question was stated, Shall it pass? when

Mr. SIMKINS moved that the bill be postponed indefinitely; which was rejected by the House.

Mr. EDWARDS moved that the bill be laid on the table; which motion was also rejected by the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Connecticut, then moved that it be postponed for two weeks. This motion was also rejected.

The question was then taken, Shall the bill pass? and was decided in the affirmative—yeas 87, nays 44, as follows:

SWORD TO COL. JOHNSON.

A resolution awarding a sword to Col. Richard M. Johnson, in consideration of his valor and good conduct at the battle with the combined English and Indian forces on the river Thames, in Upper Canada, on the 5th of October, 1818, was read twice and put on its passage.

Mr. CLAIBORNE rose to offer an amendment to the resolution. While the House was dispensing rewards, he said, for meritorious services, he wished to introduce to attention the names of two other characters. One was Major General Carroll, of Tennessee. That officer was engaged in the public service from the commencement of the late war to its glorious termination at New Orleans. Mr. C. briefly recapitulated some of the distinguished services which this officer had rendered. He had organized the force which repaired from Tennessee to the defence of New Orleans, and which by its rapid march under the direction and exertion of Gen. C. had reached that place in time to save the city from the enemy; and he had rendered other services too prominent to need being mentioned, and which would not permit him to be overlooked on this occasion. Mr. C. next mentioned Brigadier General Coffee, whose name was familiar to every one. At the commencement of the war that officer volunteered his services, and by his zeal and influence induced a great many others to enter the service. For his merit he was promoted from captain of a mounted company to the command of a brigade; and his gallant conduct in the Creek war, at Talledega, at New Orleans, &c. had proved him worthy of the distinction. Mr. C. concluded by moving to insert the names of these officers in the resolution.

Mr. POINDEXTER rose to second the motion of the honorable member from Tennessee. The distinguished services of General Carroll, from the commencement of the Creek war to the close of the late contest with Great Britain, Mr. C. said, were known to the nation, and appreciated by all who witnessed his meritorious conduct. At the critical and interesting period, when a powerful and well-disciplined army of the enemy invaded the State of Louisiana, and menaced the city of New Orleans, the exertions of General Carroll were particularly conspicuous, and eminently contributed to the glorious result which gave security to that city and renown to the arms of our country. The division of militia from the State of Tennessee, under his command, destined to participate in the defence of the Southern frontier, descended from Nashville to New Orleans with unexampled rapidity, and arrived at a moment the most auspicious to the safety of that important point. Without this reinforcement General Jackson would have been destitute of the force called for by that great emergency. The consequences of such deficiency might be imagined. During that memorable campaign the gallantry of this corps and of its intrepid commander elicited the thanks of a grateful people, and of the illustrious General under whom they fought and conquered. I accord my hearty assent, said Mr. P., to the proposition made by the gentleman from Tennessee to reward these services by a suitable manifestation of the national gratitude. But Mr. P. suggested to him the propriety of presenting it in a distinct resolution, properly digested and matured.

Mr. DESHA made a few remarks in support of the expressions of the resolution, as to the gallant conduct of Col. Johnson, on the occasion referred to. He was present when those services were performed, and could bear testimony to the intrepidity displayed by Col. J.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, according to the suggestion of Mr. POINDEXTER, withdrew his proposition for the present; and the resolution then passed nem. con.

THURSDAY, April 2.

The SPEAKER presented a petition of Vicente Pazos, of Peru, in South America, on behalf of himself and others, praying compensation for their private property which was taken possession of upon the occupation of Amelia Island by the troops of the United States.—Referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. SEYBERT reported a bill to change the name of the district of Erie in the State of Ohio; which was read twice and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-day.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to adjust the claims to lots in the town of Vincennes, and for the sale of the land appropriated as a common for the use of the inhabitants of the said town," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the State of Pennsylvania, transmitting a certificate of the election of Jacob Hostetter, as a member of this House, in the place of Jacob Spangler, resigned; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act to change the name of the district of Erie, in the State of Ohio; and An act to provide for the publication of the laws of the United States, and for other purposes, were severally read a third time and passed.

APRIL, 1818.

An engrossed bill for the relief of George Pearson was read the third time and passed.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act limiting the time for claims being produced for lands authorized to be granted to the inhabitants of New Madrid," was read a third time and passed.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants and returning surveys thereon to the General Land Office; and for designating the western boundary line of the Virginia military tract," was read the third time, and passed as amended.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act confirming the claim of Tobias Rheams to a tract of land granted to him by the Spanish Government," with amendments. They have also passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Lemuel H. Osgood;" in which amendments and bill they ask the concurrence of the House.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to provide for paying to the State of Indiana three per cent. out of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands in said State, to be expended in the construction of roads and canals within the same.

Mr. HENDRICKS made an unsuccessful motion to strike out a clause which imposed on the State of Indiana annual reports of the proceedings under the bill; but the Committee having risen and reported the bill, Mr. H. renewed his motion, which was then agreed to, and the bill ordered to be engrossed, as amended, and read a third time.

The following bills successively passed through Committees of the Whole House, and were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, viz:

The bill for the relief of Sarah Dewees; the bill for the relief of Gad Worthington; the bill for the relief of Thomas and John Clifford, and others; the bill for the relief of Commodore John Rodgers; and the bill for the relief of certain friendly Creek Indians.

HONORS TO THE BRAVE.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, agreeably to the intimation which he had yesterday given, to submit a resolution for awarding to certain officers testimonials of the respect of Congress for their distinguished service, offered the following joint resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be requested to cause gold medals to be struck, with suitable emblems and devices, and presented to Major General William Carroll and Brigadier General John Coffee, in testimony of the high sense entertained by Congress of their gallantry and good conduct in the several conflicts during the late war, at Talashatchie, Taladea, Enotochopko, Emucklaw, Tehopeka, and New Orleans.

Resolved, That the President be requested to cause a gold medal to be struck, with suitable emblems and devices, and presented to Major General Joseph Desha, in testimony of the high sense entertained by Congress of his gallantry and good conduct in the conflict of the river Thames, in Upper Canada.

Mr. CLAIBORNE said he had not yesterday named General Desha, in the remarks he then made; it escaped his recollection at the moment; but that officer was well entitled to the notice of the House. General Desha, it would be recollected, had left his seat in Congress, in the Summer of 1813, when the Northwestern campaign was a subject of great anxiety, and joined the Northwestern army, as commander of a division of Kentucky troops, and to his intrepidity and good conduct was in a great degree owing the result of the battle on the Thames. On that occasion he occupied, with his division, a situation of imminent danger; and at a moment when the enemy pressed with great force on that part of the line, it was by General Desha's courage and example, and denouncing death to the first man that broke, that the ground was maintained, the tide of victory turned, and the day crowned with success. Mr. C. next turned to the services of Generals Carroll and Coffee, and enforced what he had yesterday said of them, by referring again to the various instances of the zeal, activity and bravery which had characterized their conduct, and which, under the Almighty, had saved the city of New Orleans from a ferocious enemy.

Mr. HARRISON said, that with regard to the conduct of General Desha, in the action on the Thames, he had mentioned it with approbation in his official report of the action, and he now repeated that he there performed his duty, and did everything that he could do. But, so did General Henry, who was third in command, whilst General Desha was fourth; they stand in that respect, perfectly on an equality.

Mr. H. moved, therefore, that the name of General William Henry be inserted in the second resolution. Mr. H. gave some explanations of the positions occupied by the two divisions in the action, and stated that it was the division of General Henry which occupied the front line, and was most pressed by the enemy; that of General Desha formed with it a right angle, and though less exposed, yet General Desha himself, he believed was at the point of junction where the fire was most heavy.

Mr. CLAIBORNE had not called to mind the particular circumstances of the affair, or doubtless he should have recollected the name of General Henry, and would have included him in the resolutions which he had offered. These were honorary rewards that cost the nation little, and he was always willing to bestow them upon gallant services. He had intended to propose swords on this occasion, but he found, by the precedents, that medals were more customary, though the cost of the latter was perhaps not less.

Mr. OGLE suggested a doubt whether, if these resolutions passed, it would not be proper also to seek out the meritorious officers of the Revolution. He had no objection to voting a medal to each of the gallant officers named, but protested against selecting the officers of the late army and passing by those of the Revolution, for, if the former merited one medal, those of the latter deserved two, and he moved that the subject be referred to the Military Committee, that resolutions might be reported conformably to his ideas; or at least that the distinguished officers of the Revolutionary Army might be included in these honorary rewards.

Mr. COLSTON, though feeling the highest respect for the officers mentioned, and for their eminent services, yet objected to these resolutions on the ground that it was neither customary nor proper, in voting these rewards, to go below the commander of an army who had to bear the disgrace of defeat, and who it was right should reap the rewards of success; that to pursue a different course would involve the necessity of awarding the same to numerous other cases, as there were at least fifty others who had rendered important services and were entitled to notice; and it was better to stop, or Congress would be overwhelmed with cases of this kind, &c. Mr. C. referred to the evils which he had witnessed in Virginia, of making these rewards too common; and referred to the circumstance of the Legislature of that State being called on to appropriate fifteen thousand dollars, at one time, for the purchase of medals, &c. which had been voted to gallant officers from that State. He had opposed the practice then, and felt himself bound, however high his sense of the merits of the distinguished officers in question, to do it here.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said a few words to Mr. CLAIBORNE, to show that the vote of a gold medal had always been considered a higher honor than to bestow a sword, and that medals had, therefore, been generally given to the Commander-in-chief of an army, and swords to the inferior officers.

Mr. CLAIBORNE observed, in reply to Mr. COLSTON, that the services of the officer named in the first resolution were as important and valuable as those of any Commander-in-chief in the nation; and if these distinctions had been granted in numerous other instances, as he could show they had been, it was highly proper they should be in this case, particularly when some who had received the honor had not served so long, nor rendered services half so important as the officers he now brought forward in the first resolution. Mr. C. then referred, severally, to the resolutions voting thanks and medals to General Brown, to General Scott, to Generals Ripley, Miller, and Porter, to General Gaines, and to General McComb, accompanied by thanks to their officers and men, and relied on these resolutions to show that the honors of Congress had not been confined to the Commanders-in-chief, but, on the contrary, they were nearly all subordinate officers, and some not higher than the rank of Colonel. Generals Carroll and Coffee, if they had not the reputation of Commanders-in-chief, deserved the applause of saving a city from a merciless enemy, whose rallying words were "Beauty and Booty." Mr. C. adverted to the circumstances under which these officers received the news of the danger of New Orleans, and the great exertions which enabled them to reach it in time. Coffee was returning home from the Creek war, with an exhausted army, when information of the danger of New Orleans reached him at Baton Rouge. With his exhausted men and worn down horses he instantly started for the scene of action. No rest did he permit himself, day or night, but hastened with a celerity unexampled and astonishing, and arrived just in time to save the city and win a conquest which will ever be regarded as a most important and most glorious one. Would the House deny to such men as these the poor and pitiful reward now proposed? Carroll had been twice wounded in the Creek war, and was called on, at a moment's warning, to repair to New Orleans. He hastily collected his troops, organized them for the field in less time than was ever known, and with a rapidity never witnessed before, by his unwearied exertions reached the city just in time to insure the victory and share in its glory. Mr. C. agreed to what had been said about the Revolutionary veterans, but hoped, if it was thought proper to reward them in this way, that gentlemen would bring them forward in a separate proposition, and he would cheerfully support it. If he asked for what was not given to others, turn them away. If he asked for what they did not deserve, turn them away. But if he asked for them what others had received, and which they deserved much more than some who had received this distinction, he hoped it would not be denied to them.

Mr. HOPKINSON made a few remarks to dissuade the House from adopting these resolutions. It was a painful task to urge this course; but, he said this House had no wealth to bestow; these honors were all it had to give; they ought, therefore, to be given sparingly, and not wasted. The honors of Congress ought not to be given, he said, for fidelity, for diligence, and bravery, because these were to be expected, and belonged to every American officer; but were intended for some signal action above all, to be rewarded above all. Instead of confining these marks of distinction to proper occasions, all history did not furnish as many of them as the history of this country for the last two or three years, and the practice was so common that it would cease to be any distinction at all. Mr. H. did not make these objections from any insensibility to the gallant services of the officers referred to by Mr. CLAIBORNE; but, besides his opposition on national grounds, he thought that delicacy towards these officers themselves ought to forbid the passage of the resolutions. It was now three years since the close of the war, and the public would ask why these officers had not received this reward before; why, for the first time, they were brought forward at this late day? And, after being so long neglected, might not the proceeding now be imputed to personal favor? Mr. H. concluded by moving that the resolutions lie on the table.

Mr. POINDEXTER hoped that the motion to lay the resolutions on the table would be withdrawn, that the two resolutions might be separated and the sense of the House taken on each by itself.

H. OF R.

Militia Pay—Seminole War.

APRIL, 1818.

The subjects of the Northwestern and of the Southern officers ought, he thought, to be introduced separately, and then gentlemen in the House, acquainted personally with the officers in the two armies, could speak of them, respectively, from their own knowledge. He supported the propriety of adopting these resolutions by referring to the votes of thanks, &c., which had been passed at this very session, and the sword which only yesterday was awarded to a gallant officer. To reject the cases now before the House, under those circumstances, would be invidious as well as unjust.

Mr. RHEA hoped the resolutions would not be laid on the table. Had they not been brought forward at all this session he should have been satisfied, because the reputation of these gallant men was too well secured to make this distinction necessary; but as the resolutions had been offered he was anxious they should not be rejected. These brave men did not rest when they were going on the floods to meet the enemies of their country, and he hoped the resolutions for rewarding them would not be allowed to rest on the table, but would be adopted.

Mr. HARRISON again rose to bear testimony to the gallant services of the gentlemen of the Northwestern army, and took the opportunity of expressing briefly his sense of the distinguished honor which he had recently himself received at the hands of Congress—a reward more dear to him than any other that could be conferred on him, but which he must look on as due to the gallant army which he had the honor to command rather than to his merits, &c.

After some further opposition by Mr. CLAIRBORNE to laying the resolution on the table, the question was taken on that motion and carried—ayes 58, noes 54.

FRIDAY, April 3.

Mr. SEYBERT reported a bill to establish a port of entry and delivery, at Cape Vincent, at the fork of Lake Ontario and the head of the river St. Lawrence; which was read twice and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. SEYBERT also reported a bill, declaring the consent of Congress to an act of the State of Georgia, passed the 10th of December, 1817, "to establish the fees of the harbor-master and health officer of the port of Darien;" which was read twice and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SEYBERT also reported a bill to abolish the port of delivery established at the mouth of Slade's Creek, in the State of North Carolina; which was read twice and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. TYCKER, of Virginia, from the committee on so much of the public accounts and expenditures as relates to the public buildings, made a report; which was read and ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Michael Hogan," reported the same with an amendment; which was read, and, together with the bill, committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee appointed on the 16th ultimo, by leave of the House, reported a bill to authorize the people of the Missouri Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act confirming the claim of Tobias Rheams to a tract of land granted him by the Spanish Government," was read, and concurred in by the House.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of Sarah Dewees, relict and widow of William Dewees, deceased, and the heirs and legal representatives of the said William Dewees; An act for the relief of Gad Worthington; An act for the relief of the houses of Thomas and John Clifford, Elisha Fisher and Company, Thomas Clifford and Son, and Thomas Clifford, of Philadelphia, and Charles Wirgman, of Baltimore; An act for the relief of John Rodgers; and An act for the relief of certain friendly Creek Indians; were severally read the third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of Lemuel H. Osgood, was read twice, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill from the Senate, to provide for paying to the State of Indiana three per cent. of the net proceeds arising from the sales of the United States lands within the same, was read a third time, as amended, and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate "directing the manner of appointing Indian agents, and continuing the act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes;" and, after some debate, the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of Loring Austin; which gave rise to much debate.

The bill proposes to relieve Major Austin from the effects of a prosecution against him for false imprisonment, in a case in which, by orders from General Pike that he was bound to obey, he seized certain persons at Ogdensburg, suspected of treasonable practices with the enemy. After the debate the bill was reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed.

The bill for the relief of Major General Jacob Brown, and the bill for the relief of George R. Wells, passed through the same committee, and were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

MILITIA PAY—SEMINOLE WAR.

Mr. COBB submitted for consideration the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs

Proceedings.

be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the pay of the militia now in the service, or which may hereafter be called into the service of the United States, in the war now prosecuting against the Seminole tribe of Indians, and of affording additional pay to those who have been in service in said war, and have been discharged."

Mr. C. observed, that an apology was due to the House for offering this resolution at such a late day in the session; the apology he should make was, that he had understood this measure had been introduced early in the session in the Senate; from causes unknown to him, that body had not yet acted upon it.

Mr. C. further observed, that if he recollected correctly the published arguments which were urged for retaining the number of ten thousand men upon the Peace Establishment of the Army, one was that, out of that number, a sufficient force could at all times be commanded to put an end to any Indian war which might happen, without calling upon the militia; yet an Indian war had happened, which one of the General officers of the United States had chosen emphatically to call a little war; to terminate which, a militia force of at least four thousand men had been called into service. It was not for him to give reasons for this procedure. There were at this time in service at least three thousand men of the Georgia and Tennessee militia. They had been called out at a season of the year, above all others, of the most consequence to them; for that they would be in service just long enough to deprive them of the opportunity of making a crop upon their farms. In addition to this he would observe, that a more inclement season had hardly ever been witnessed in that part of the country where the militia were. If his information was correct, they had been exposed to incessant rains, from the time they were embodied until he last heard from them. But this was not all—they had been starved. He had understood and believed that the Tennessee militia, after having entered the nation, were compelled to return to their settlements in Georgia in order to be subsisted; and that the Georgia militia had been reduced to an allowance of a half a pint of corn a day. To whom the blame of this state of things was to be attached he would not say; but he thought that persons suffering such hardships and privations were entitled to a greater compensation than the pitiful sum of five dollars per month. He thought that the House would agree with him, that not less than double that sum would be but a poor reward to men thus situated. He was of opinion that, had the militia been properly fed and attended to, they would not have complained, or cared for the trifling pay now allowed them by law. But he thought the Government ought at least to increase the weight of their pockets, after failing to afford them food. He concluded by saying, he had offered these observations with the motive of inducing the House, not only to adopt the resolution he had offered, but speedily to adopt any measure founded on it. The motion was agreed to.

SATURDAY, April 4.

Mr. THOMAS M. NELSON presented a memorial of Brigadier General Daniel Parker, Adjutant and Inspector General of the Army of the United States, containing an explanation of the circumstances attending his certificate of the authenticity of the signature of Colonel Isaac Clark, late of the Army, which, subsequently proved to be a forgery; which certificate has been made the subject of animadversion in the report of the committee appointed to inquire into the conduct of clerks and other officers of Government.—Laid on the table.

Mr. RHEA, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, to which was committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs of Landon Carter," reported the same with an amendment; which was read, and, together with the bill, committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill for the relief of Cornelia Mason.

Mr. RHEA also reported the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Samuel Ward," without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was committed the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Daniel Burnett, Gibson Clark, and the legal representatives of Hubert Rowell," reported their agreement to the said amendment with an amendment; which was read, and, together with the bill, ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. STROTHER, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplemental to the act, entitled 'An act further to amend the charter of the City of Washington,'" reported the same with an amendment; which was read, and, together with the bill, committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to increase the pay of the militia while in actual service, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BLOUNT, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill to establish and alter post roads; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the select committee, to whom was referred a resolution of the 13th February, and a memorial from a number of the citizens of Philadelphia, respecting the imprisonment of Richard W. Meade, made a report, comprising a general view of the case; and concluding with the recommendation of a resolution, that this House will support the Executive in all proper measures which he may take to procure the release of Mr. Meade from confinement.

The report was read, and ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. PIRKIN, from the joint committee appointed to examine and report what business is necessary to be done by Congress previous to the adjournment of the present session, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, the Secretary for the Department of the Navy was instructed to report to this House, during the first week of the next session of Congress, a particular statement of the expenditure of the appropriations made by an act rewarding the officers and crew of the frigate Constitution; and the officers and crew of the Wasp, passed March 3d, 1813; also, by an act to reward the officers and crew of the sloop of war Hornet, and Lieutenant Elliot, and his officers and companions, passed July 13th, 1813; also, by an act authorizing the purchase of the vessels captured on Lake Erie, passed 18th April, 1814; also, by an act authorizing the purchase of vessels captured on Lake Champlain, passed March 3d, 1815; also, by an act rewarding the officers and crew of the sloop of war Hornet, for the capture and destruction of the British sloop of war Penguin, passed February 28th, 1816; and also by an act providing for the distribution of $100,000, among the captors of the Algerine vessels captured and restored to the Dey of Algiers, passed April 27th, 1816; designating the names of the prize agents appointed under the several acts, and the payments by them respectively made, specifying the time when, and persons to whom the same may have been made, and the balance, if any, remaining in their hands unexpended.

On motion of Mr. SLOCUMB, the Secretary for the Department of War was directed to prepare and report to this House, at the next session, a system providing for the abolition of the existing Indian trading establishments of the United States, and providing for the opening of the trade with the Indians to individuals, under suitable regulations.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Michael Jones;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. BASSSETT, from the Committee on the Public Buildings, made a report, stating the probability of the wings of the Capitol being completed for the use of Congress before the next session, but the deficiency of the wings in committee rooms, and recommending the erection of a temporary building for that purpose, until the centre building of the Capitol shall be erected.

Mr. LVERMORE submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring therein, That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States, be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as a part of the said Constitution:

"No person shall be held to service or labor as a slave, nor shall slavery be tolerated in any State hereafter admitted into the Union, or made one of the United States of America."

The resolution was read, and, on the question of proceeding to its consideration, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, laid on the Clerk's table two acts of the Parliament of Great Britain, one, entitled "An act to consolidate and extend the several laws now in force, for allowing the importation and exportation of certain goods and merchandise into, and from, certain ports in the West Indies," passed the 27th June, 1805; the other, entitled "An act to permit the importation of rice, grain, and flour, from any foreign colonies on the continent of America, into certain ports in the West Indies, and to allow certain articles to be imported from the United States of America into the British provinces of North America, for the purpose of exportation to the British islands in the West Indies," passed on the 30th of June, 1805; which were ordered to be printed for the use of the members of Congress.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Secretary of State on the petition of Jonathan Elliot; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The bill from the Senate, directing the appointing Indian agents, &c., was read the third time, and passed.

The engrossed bills for the relief of Major General Jacob Brown; to establish a port of entry at Cape Vincent, at the fork of Lake Ontario and the River St. Lawrence; to abolish the port of delivery established at the mouth of Slade's creek, in North Carolina; for the relief of Loring Austin; and for the relief of George R. Wells;—were severally read the third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate disagree to the amendment proposed by this House to the bill, entitled "An act to provide for paying the State of Indiana three per cent. of the net proceeds arising from the sales of the United States' lands within the same." They have passed bills of this House, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1818;" and "An act for the relief of Narcissus Broutin and others;" with amendments. They have also passed a bill, entitled "An act concerning navigation;"—in which amendments and bill they ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act concerning navigation," was read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill supplementary to the act regulating the duties on imports and tonnage, passed the 27th April, 1816.

The amendment proposed by this House, to the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to provide for paying to the State of Indiana three per cent. of the net proceeds, arising from the sales of the United States lands within the same," and to which the Senate have disagreed, was read; when, Mr. HENDRICKS moved that this House insist on the said amendment. This motion was rejected; and the question was taken, Will the House recede from their said amendment? and passed in the affirmative.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Narcissus Broutin and others," were read and concurred in by the House.

The amendments of the Senate to the general appropriation bill were considered in a Committee of the Whole, agreed to by the committee, and concurred in by the House.

The bill for the relief of John Anderson passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to a third reading.

STATE OF ILLINOIS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to enable the people of Illinois Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on a footing with the original States.

Mr. POPE moved to amend the bill by striking out the lines defining the boundaries of the new States, and to insert the following:

"Beginning at the mouth of the Wabash river; thence up the same, and with the line of Indiana to the northwest corner of said State; thence east with the line of the same State to the middle of Lake Michigan; thence north along the middle of said lake to north latitude 42 deg. 30 minutes; thence west to the middle of the Mississippi river; and thence down along the middle of that river to its confluence with the Ohio river; and thence up the latter river along its northwestern shore to the beginning."

The object of this amendment, Mr. P. said, was to gain, for the proposed State, a coast on Lake Michigan. This would afford additional security to the perpetuity of the Union, inasmuch as the State would thereby be connected with the States of Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New York, through the Lakes. The facility of opening a canal between Lake Michigan and the Illinois river, said Mr. P., is acknowledged by every one who has visited the place. Giving to the proposed State the port of Chicago, (embraced in the proposed limits,) will draw its attention to the opening of the communication between the Illinois river and that place, and the improvement of that harbor. It was believed, he said, upon good authority, that the line of separation between Indiana and Illinois would strike Lake Michigan south of Chicago, and not pass west of it, as had been supposed by some geographers who had favored us with maps of that country; and, Mr. P. added, that all the country north of the proposed State, and bounded by Lakes Michigan, Huron, Superior, and of the Woods, and the Mississippi river, must form but one State, Congress being restricted, by the ordinance of 1787, from erecting more than five States in the Northwestern Territory.

This motion was agreed to without a division. Mr. POPE then moved further to amend the bill, by striking out that part which appropriated the State's proportion of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands to the construction of roads and canals in said State, and to insert the following:

"For the purposes following, viz: two-fifths to be disbursed, under the direction of Congress, in making roads leading to the State; the residue to be appropriated by the Legislature of the State for the encouragement of learning, of which one — part shall be exclusively bestowed on a college or university."

Mr. P. said, that the fund proposed to be applied for the encouragement of learning had, in the other new States, been devoted to roads; but its application had, it was believed, not been productive of the good anticipated; on the contrary, it had been exhausted on local and neighborhood objects, by its distribution among the counties, according to their respective representation in the Legislature. The importance of education in a Republic, he said, was universally acknowledged; and that no immediate aid could be derived in new counties from waste lands was not less obvious; and that no active fund would be provided in a new State, the history of the Western States too clearly proved. In addition to this, Mr. P. said, nature had left little to be done in the proposed State of Illinois, in order to have the finest roads in the world. Besides, roads would be made by the inhabitants as they became useful, because the benefits are immediate; but not so with endowments to schools. The effects of these institutions were too remote. Nor would the interest of the United States be impaired by this plan. The land on the roads was generally private property before the opening of the road; and the benefit resulting to the United States from the stipulation would be found alone in the exemption from taxation, for five years, of lands sold in the State.

This motion was also agreed to without a division; and after receiving some further amendments, the most important of which was one moved by Mr. TAYLOR, to exempt the soldiers' bounty lands in the State from taxation for three years—

The Committee rose and reported the bill to the House, and it was ordered to be engrossed, as amended, and read a third time, nemine contradicente.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the resolutions reported by the Committee on Roads, Canals, and Seminaries of Learning; and the said resolutions being amended to read as follows, to wit:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to report to this House, at the ensuing session of Congress, a plan for the application of such means as are within the power of Congress, to the purpose of opening and constructing such roads and canals, as may deserve and require the aid of Government, with a view to military operations in time of war; the transportation of munitions of war; and the more complete defence of the United States; and also, a statement of the works of the nature abovementioned, which have been commenced; the progress which has been made; and the means and prospect of their completion; and, together with such information, as in the opinion of the Secretary, shall be material in relation to the objects of this resolution.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to prepare and report to this House, at their next session, a plan for the application of such means as are within the power of Congress, to the purpose of opening and improving roads, and making canals; together with a statement of the undertakings of that nature, which, as objects of public improvement, may require and deserve the aid of the Government; and, also, a statement of works of the nature above-mentioned which have been commenced; the progress which has been made in them; the means and prospect of their being completed; the public improvements carried on by States or by companies, or incorporations which have been associated for such purposes, to which it may be deemed expedient to subscribe or afford assistance; the terms and conditions of such associations and the state of their funds, and such information, as, in the opinion of the Secretary shall be material in relation to the objects of this resolution.

The question was taken to agree to the said resolution, and passed in the affirmative—yeas 76, nays 57, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson of Kentucky, Bateman, Bayley, Campbell, Cobb, Comstock, Crawford, Cruger, Cushman, Darlington, Ellicott, Floyd, Forsyth, Gage, Haabrouck, Hendricks, Herkimer, Herrick, Hitchcock, Holmes of Massachusetts, Holmes of Connecticut, Hopkinson, Irving of New York, Johnson of Kentucky, Kinsey, Linn, Little, Livermore, Lowndes, W. #### ORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill respecting the organization of the Army, and for other purposes; and on the bill for the relief of John Work; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee reported the first-mentioned bill with amendments, and the last-mentioned bill without amendment.

The said amendments were read, and the first thereof concurred in, and the last rejected by the House.

Mr. T. M. NELSON then moved further to amend the said bill by inserting therein the following, as the fifth section thereof, viz:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That those soldiers who enlisted for and during the late war with Great Britain, and who served faithfully until the termination thereof was announced by the Proclamation of the President of the United States, shall be entitled to the bounty land which they would have been entitled to, had they obtained an honorable discharge.

And, on the question to agree to this section, it was determined in the negative.

The said bill was then further amended, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time on Monday next.

The bill for the relief of John Work was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time on Monday next.

HISTORY OF CONGRESS.

On motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the House proceeded, by a vote of 60 to 58, to consider the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill authorizing a subscription (of one thousand copies) to the History of Congress, proposed to be undertaken by Gales & Seaton.

The House having refused to concur with the Committee of the Whole, in striking out the first section of the bill, Mr. S., with a view of removing the objections made by some gentlemen to the bill in its present shape, moved to add to the first section the following proviso:

Provided, further, That, before receiving any payment on account of said work, the publishers shall enter into bond in a penalty of twenty thousand dollars, with security to be approved by the First Comptroller, that the said work shall not exceed ten volumes in extent, to be brought up to the end of the second session of the fourteenth Congress, and shall be completed within ten years from the day on which the first payment on account thereof is demanded: And provided, also, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to preclude Congress from rescinding their subscription to the said work, whenever it shall to them seem expedient.

This amendment was agreed to without a division; when Mr. HITCHCOCK moved to reduce the subscription from one thousand to one hundred copies; which motion he afterwards modified, by moving two hundred and fifty.

This motion was opposed by Mr. SERGEANT, because, he argued, it would be equivalent to a rejection of the bill; as the great labor of the compilation, the expense of preparing the work for the press, the expense of printing volumes of the magnitude proposed, &c., could not be undertaken without aid from Congress, to the extent proposed by the select committee; and because a work of this nature could not depend on private subscription, &c. Mr. S. also enforced and enlarged on the national importance of the work proposed, as well as its importance to Congress in its legislative business, &c.; in which he was supported by Mr. SIMKINS, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, and Mr. LIVERMORE.

The bill was opposed earnestly by Mr. PITKIN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. BUTLER, principally on the ground of the expense, and the unimportance of the work compared with that expense.

Mr. HITCHCOCK's motion to reduce the number of copies to be subscribed for was agreed to—ayes 74, noes 56—when, on motion by Mr. BASSETT, the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

MONDAY, April 6.

Mr. SEYBERT, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, made a report on the petition of Seth Sprague, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee of Claims, reported the bill from the Senate, for the relief of Lemuel H. Osgood, without amendment, and the bill was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred an inquiry into the expediency of authorizing the President of the United States to distribute an additional sum among the assessors of the United States, made a report adverse to such a measure; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SPENCER, from a select committee, made a report on the petition of John Daily and Samuel Thompson, accompanied by a bill for their relief; which was twice read, and committed.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, of the 19th of February last, on the petition of Mary Graeff; and the resolution therein contained was read, and is as follows:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

Mr. SERGEANT moved to amend the resolution, so as to make it read—

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner is reasonable and ought to be granted, and that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill to that effect.

The question being taken so to amend the resolution, it passed in the affirmative.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Daniel Burnett, Gibson Clark, and the legal representatives of Hubert Rowell;" and the amendment proposed by the Committee on Private Land Claims to the said amendment being read, Mr. POINDEXTER, the acting chairman of the said committee withdrew the said amendment; and the amendment proposed by the Senate to the said bill was then concurred in by the House.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act to enable the people of the Illinois Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; An act for the relief of John Anderson; An act for the relief of John Work; and, An act respecting the organization of the Army and for other purposes, were severally read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting the proceedings of the court martial held for the trial of Franklin Wharton, Lieutenant Colonel of Marines; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of limiting the allowance of drawback of duties upon merchandise, to merchandise imported into the United States, and exported therefrom in American vessels.

The bill to continue in force the act relating to settlers on the public lands; the bill for the relief of Benjamin Birdsall and Wm. S. Foster; and the bill for the relief of Frederick Brown, severally passed through a Committee of the whole House, and were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

NAVAL AFFAIRS—COURTS MARTIAL.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the following report made by the naval committee on the first instant.

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom were referred a resolution, instructing them to inquire whether any, and, if any, what alterations are necessary and proper to be made in the several laws relating to the government of the Navy; also, the proceedings of certain courts martial lately held in the Mediterranean, for the trials of Captain Oliver H. Perry, Captain John Heath, and Captain John O. Creighton; also the memorial of certain midshipmen belonging to the Mediterranean squadron, addressed to the President of the United States, report:

The committee have examined the several subjects referred to them, and are of opinion, that the general regulations for the government of the Navy do not require to be changed. With a view of ascertaining whether the circumstances which lately transpired in the Mediterranean, have grown out of a defect in the law, or the administration of the law, the committee, after an attentive consideration of the law, and of the several cases determined under it, think the defect is not in the law. Their attention has been particularly drawn to the 3d, 14th and 30th sections of the act "for the better government of the Navy of the United States." The 3d section of the said act is in the following words: "Any officer, or other person in the Navy, who shall be guilty of oppression, cruelty, &c., shall, if an officer, be cashiered, or suffer such other punishment as a court martial shall adjudge," &c. The 14th section of the said act, is in the following words: "No officer or private in the Navy shall disobey the lawful orders of his superior officer, or strike him, or draw, or offer to draw, or raise any weapon against him, while in the execution of the duties of his office, on pain of death, or such other punishment as a court martial shall inflict." The 30th section of said act is in the following words: "No commanding officer shall, of his own authority, discharge a commissioned or warrant officer, nor strike, nor punish him otherwise than by a suspension or confinement, &c., any commanding officer offending therein, shall be punished at the discretion of a court martial." It will be observed, that the punishment denounced against an inferior officer for striking, &c., his superior, may be death or such other punishment as a court martial may adjudge; whilst for a similar offence committed by a superior officer against an inferior, the punishment is such as the discretion of a court martial may award. In these two articles, such an inequality of punishment, is supposed by many to exist, as to call for a change of the law. This impression did not escape the attention of the committee; but, on mature reflection, they were led to doubt the propriety of the opinion—striking, drawing weapons, &c., on the part of inferior against superiors, in military bodies, carries along with it the idea of insubordination and mutiny; under such circumstances no military body can exist, or if it exist at all, it must be to purposes worse than useless. It is believed, that at all times, and in all nations, who had correct ideas of military discipline, the power to punish mutiny with death, has been vested in their military tribunals; nor do they think it could be dispensed with in this Government; for they believe the principle to be correct, that in free governments, the rigor of military discipline is as necessary, perhaps more so, as under governments of a different character; and it is a circumstance well understood, that persons going into military service, part for the time with a portion of their civil rights. The committee are of opinion, that it would be inexpedient to change this part of the naval regulations.

Their attention was next drawn to the opposite view of the question. Oppression, and striking inferiors by superiors, are punishable; the first, by cashiering, or such other punishment as a court martial shall adjudge; the second, at the discretion of a court martial. This part of the subject having given rise to the late occurrences among the officers in the Mediterranean, claimed and received the undivided attention of the committee. They examined the propriety of fixing some definite punishment in these cases; such as a suspension for a certain length of time, below which no court martial should be at liberty to go, in adjudging the penalty to be awarded for a commission of the offence. But, on mature consideration, difficulties, which the committee considered as great, if not insuperable, were believed to attend such a provision. Let us suppose that such is the law; when the case comes to be examined, it is found that a number of circumstances exist, which reduce the offence to almost nothing; or on the other hand, circumstances are discovered of a character so aggravated, as to give it a very different complexion. Let us take, by way of illustration, the two cases of Captain Perry and Captain Creighton, both now under the consideration of the committee; in the former, the committee see circumstances of a character which, in their opinion, would have justified a much more rigorous sentence of the court martial towards that officer, as high and deserved a favorite of his country as he was, and it is with no small regret, that the committee feel it their duty to express the opinion. On the other hand, for a charge in part of a similar character, the charge of striking Midshipman Marston by Captain Creighton, they see nothing of sufficient importance to have attracted attention. Thus situated, numberless shades of difference attending almost every case which can be supposed to occur, the committee believe that fixing by law a minimum punishment, if it were of sufficient magnitude to have any effect, would be improper. The committee think a reference to our civil trials will illustrate this part of the subject. Thus in the trial by jury, that body exercise an entire discretion, in all actions of assault and battery, &c., and graduate the penalty to the offence, according to the circumstances of each case. It is also in accordance with the mild character of the criminal codes of most of the States composing this Union, in which a scale of punishment is graduated according to the degree of offence. The committee know, that where the law can be defined with propriety, the discretion of no tribunal whatever ought to be as much relied on, as proper legal definitions. They have stated the difficulties which presented themselves, and which they find of such a character as to induce them to consider a change inadvisable. The committee also state, that it would be with much reluctance they would relinquish their confidence in courts martial, composed of officers whose conduct had so justly merited the confidence of their country.

The committee are aware, that in examining the conduct of the courts martial referred to them, the path of their duty led over very delicate ground. They know, that no law which they could recommend would operate otherwise than prospectively; and also, that they have no power to reverse or unsettle the decisions; but these proceedings having been referred to them, as connected with the subject of the inquiry, that inquiry having, in fact, grown out of them, they have thought it right to express the opinion they have done. Indeed, the body to which the committee belong, and who have charged them with the inquiry, constitute the grand inquest of the nation, whose duty it is, on proper occasions, to inquire into the conduct of the highest officers of the Government.

The committee then, taking into consideration all the circumstances of the cases referred to them, trusting that the officers of the Navy, to whom are confided the important duties intrusted to courts martial, with a due regard to the laws of their country, ever to be held sacred by those intrusted with their execution, and constituting the only criterion between free and despotic Governments, will exert themselves to heal the wounds, with which the discipline of the Navy has been at least threatened; a discipline, so admirable in itself, and which was not known to exist till its effects were witnessed by the world, and which, once lost, the Navy itself would be a useless burden on the community. The committee, trusting these highly important considerations will have their due and proper weight, conclude, by recommending to the House the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the several subjects referred to them.

After the foregoing report was read, on Wednesday last, Mr. JOHNSON of Virginia, moved to recommit it to the Committee on Naval Affairs, with instructions "so to amend the act, entitled 'An act for the better government of the Navy of the United States,' (approved April, 1800,) as to subject the superior officer, who shall strike or draw, or offer to draw, or raise any weapon against his inferior officer, to a forfeiture of his commission, and dismissal from the service."

This motion coming up now for decision, Mr. JOHNSON spoke with much earnestness, and at some length in support of it; when, the question being taken thereon, it was decided in the negative; and the resolution recommended by the Committee was then agreed to, and the Committee discharged from the further consideration of the subject accordingly.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The House then went into Committee on the bill to provide for erecting additional buildings for the accommodation of the Executive Departments, and the bill making appropriations for the public buildings, and for furnishing the Capitol and President's House.

Much time was occupied in maturing the details of these bills, and in discussing the various sums with which it was proposed to fill the blanks. Among the motions to amend the bill, was one to have the additional public offices erected near the Capitol, which was negatived without a division.

After having gone through these bills, they were reported to the House, and various other amendments were proposed, and variously decided, after a good deal of debate; on some of which the yeas and nays were called for, and were twice taken, and once or twice refused.

On the question to concur with the Committee of the Whole in their amendment to fill the blank in the bill attached to the following item: "For furnishing the Representative Chamber and Committee Rooms," with the sum of thirty thousand dollars, the vote stood thus—yeas 74, nays 68, as follows:

The question was then stated to concur with the Committee of the Whole, in their amendment to fill the blank in the said bill attached to the following item, to wit: "For furnishing the President's House," with the sum of forty thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine dollars. And being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 52, nays 90, as follows:

The said blank was then filled with $30,000.

The question was then stated to concur with the Committee of the Whole in their amendment to fill the blank in the said bill, attached to the following item, to wit: "For offices to the President's House," with the sum of nine thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven dollars; and decided in the negative.

Mr. TAYLOR then moved to fill the blank with $9,000; which was rejected.

Mr. BASSETT moved nine thousand four hundred; which was rejected.

Mr. HOLMES of Massachusetts, moved eight thousand.—Rejected.

Mr. BASSETT moved to strike out this item altogether.—Rejected.

On motion of Mr. COLSTON, the blank was then filled with $7,000.

Mr. HITCHCOCK moved to amend the bill by striking out this item: "For procuring materials, laying the foundation, and other preparations for the centre building of the Capitol, $100,000." Negatived—yeas 44.

A motion was made by Mr. W. P. MACLAY, to amend the bill by inserting after the appropriation for finishing the Representative Chamber, the words "or so much of the said sum as he (the Speaker) may deem necessary;" which motion was negatived.

And the bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. As ordered to be engrossed, the bill embraces the following appropriations:

For the completion of the wings of the Capitol, in addition to the sum of $200,000 already appropriated, the further sum of $80,000.

For procuring materials, laying the foundation, and other preparations for the centre building of the Capitol, $100,000.

 And, before taking up the other bill, reported from the Committee of the Whole, respecting the building additional public offices, the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 7.

Mr. SNEYBERT, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, made reports unfavorable to the petitions of sundry cork cutters of New York and Philadelphia, and manufacturers of paper hangings, which were read and concurred in.

Mr. SEGEANT, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the relief of the widow and children of Jacob Graeff, which was twice read and committed.

The bills from the Senate, for the relief of Asahel Clark, and for the relief of Samuel H. Osgood; and the engrossed bills for the relief of Seth Sprague; to continue in force the act relating to the settlers on lands of the United States; for the relief of Benjamin Birdsall and W. S. Foster; and the bill for the relief of Frederick Brown, were severally read the third time, and passed.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of Miller and Baker, and the bill for the relief of the sufferers on the Niagara frontier during the late war.

The bill first named having been gone through, and the second taken up, a motion was made, by Mr. SLOCUM, to strike out the first section, in effect to destroy the bill.

This motion Mr. SPENCER spoke more than an hour in opposition to, and in support of the claims of the sufferers, in question; when the Committee rose and obtained leave to sit again on this bill that for the relief of Miller and Baker being ordered to a third reading.

The bill to increase the compensation of certain judges of the United States, was received from the Senate, twice read and referred.

STAFF OF THE ARMY.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the bill to reduce the staff of the Army, and to substitute a commissariat instead of the present mode of subsisting the Army by contract.

Mr. COLTON moved to strike out the clause authorizing one "principal judge advocate," so as to authorize one judge advocate only, instead of one principal and one assistant advocate; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. DESHA made an unsuccessful motion to strike out all the sections of the bill which provide for subsisting the Army by a commissariat.

Mr. DESHA said he was in favor of reducing the staff of the Army; for certainly we have the largest and most expensive staff in the world, according to the number of men. The Peace Establishment, when complete, is ten thousand men, and we have a staff sufficient for one hundred thousand. The first sections of the bill do reduce the staff, and will be a saving in point of expense. These I am in favor of; but when the whole bill is taken in connexion, it increases the staff of the Army considerably. Let us examine it. The Army is now supplied with provisions by contractors. The last five sections of the bill contemplate abolishing the contract system, and supplying the Army by a commissariat. This is making a radical change in victualling the Army. Would it not be well to examine whether this change will be an advantageous one as respects supplying the Army, as also the expense? Agreeably to the contemplated system, there is to be a commissary general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of ordnance. The President has the power of appointing as many assistant commissaries as he may think the service will require, who are to be taken from the subalterns of the Army, and are to receive twenty dollars per month, in addition to their pay in the line. How many assistant commissaries will be required? Agreeable to the report of the Secretary of War laid on your table, there are, in the Northern division, forty posts; and in the Southern division thirty-five, making seventy-five posts. At each of the posts, there must be one assistant commissary for issuing, and perhaps at one-half of the posts an assistant commissary for purchasing; one hundred and twelve assistant commissaries. Does this look like reducing the staff of the Army? These assistant commissaries are to be taken from the subalterns of the line, who are, no doubt, honorable young men; but will they lay their hands to, in issuing out the meat, flour, and the other component parts of rations? No; they must have some person to do it for them. Have they any idea of economy? I suspect not. Economy does not belong to young, highminded military men. It is the last thing a military man learns; and do not gentlemen know that there is frequently a material difference between a man doing business for himself, where he is immediately interested, and doing business for the public, as respects care, industry, and economy? When hoops fly off a barrel of flour, or brine becomes bad in barrels of pork, will they use the same exertions to save the property for the public, as if it was their own? I suspect not. And are young officers, who, perhaps, never thought of economy, suitable persons to make purchases of large quantities of provisions? Agreeably to the provisions in the bill, the contemplated measure is only intended as an experiment, as it is only to continue in operation five years, unless re-enacted; and as it is not to go into operation until next June twelvemonth, previous to which time another session will take place, I move that all the part that relates to a commissariat be struck out of the bill, which is the sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth sections. All things considered, I have no hesitation in believing that where, under the contract system, a ration costs the Government twenty cents, under this system, if adopted, it would cost forty cents, thereby doubling the expense of supplying the Army. I know that evils have occurred under the contract system, that of failing to furnish the necessary supplies in some instances, and, in some instances, furnishing bad provisions; but this might be remedied by a small amendment, by giving the contractors rank, and subjecting them to martial law. The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HARRISON) tells you that all commanders disapprove the contract system, and the gentleman from Virginia, in support of this measure, has slipped out the reason. He tells you they are not subject to martial law. Yes, sir, this is the true reason. Holding a high military command, is calculated to make a man feel despotic. They cannot bear men around them who are not subject, in everything, to their will, and liable to martial law. Then give them rank, and make them liable to martial law. This will satisfy this despotic feeling, and remedy the evils complained of, which would certainly be better than to make a radical change, by adopting a measure that will, in all probability, cost the Government double as much money as the one in operation. The gentleman from Ohio brings in the little Seminole war, to aid in shoving this bill through the House, and predicts evils in that quarter, if the mode of supplying the Army is not changed. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman had examined the provisions I propose to strike out, he would see that the contemplated system is not to go into operation till June, 1818; and does the gentleman calculate on that little Indian war continuing till that time? I have confidence enough in the General who has charge of that war, to believe that it will be crushed in half the time. But, agreeably to the gentleman's own showing, this bill is unnecessary; he tells you that the Northwestern Army was furnished a great part of the time of the last war by a commissary. Then, sir, a commanding general has the power, in cases of necessity, to appoint a commissary, or any person, to furnish supplies. Much depends on the mind, capacity, and vigilance of the commander; he directs the contractor to furnish a certain number of rations, at a given point, against a particular day; he will inquire into the contractor's means of complying, and if he finds they are not certain, he has the power of directing any other person to do it. If the power is given to the commanding general to do this in time of war, there is certainly no necessity for changing the system; for every man must see that, by changing the system, as contemplated in the sections proposed to be struck out, you will double the expense in time of peace. I beg gentlemen to pause, and not hastily adopt a measure that must be extremely expensive to the Government, and particularly when there is no necessity for adopting it at this time, as a session of Congress will intervene before the measure, if adopted, is to go into operation. We ought not entirely to lose sight of economy, as it is one of the principal pillars on which this Republican fabric stands.

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH the sixth section of the bill was amended so as to make the change in the mode of subsisting the Army to take place as soon as the state of the existing contracts shall in the opinion of the President permit, instead of the first of June, 1819, as the bill contemplated.

After some attempts further to amend the bill, it was ordered to be read a third time as amended.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the public buildings, and for furnishing the Capitol and President's House," was read the third time; and the question being stated, Shall it pass?

Mr. HERRICK moved, that the said bill be re-committed to the committee who reported it, with instructions to amend the same by striking out this item, to wit:

"For procuring materials, laying the foundation, and other preparations for the centre building of the Capitol, one hundred thousand dollars."

And the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative—yeas 53, nays 85, as follows:

Navy Pension Fund.

APRIL, 1818.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and determined in the affirmative.

The amendment reported yesterday by the Committee of the Whole to the bill to provide for erecting additional buildings for the accommodation of the several Executive Departments, was read and concurred in by the House, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

The Senate having disagreed to the amendments of this House, to the bill directing the manner of appointing Indian agents, &c., a committee was appointed on the part of the House to confer with the committee appointed by the Senate on the disagreeing votes; and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, April 8.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of this House of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of General Moses Porter; and An act to authorize the payment of certain certificates, with amendments.

They have also passed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of Aquilla Giles; An act authorizing the disposal of certain lots of public ground in the city of New Orleans, and town of Mobile; An act to repeal part of the act, entitled "An act to provide for surveying the coasts of the United States; and An act confirming Anthony Cavalier and Peter Petit in their claim to a tract of land; in which amendments and last mentioned bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

The House, on motion of Mr. BARBOUR, reversed the report of the Committee of Pensions, made on the 9th February, unfavorable to the petition of Mary Sullivan; and the report, as amended, was recommitted to the Committee of Pensions with instructions to bring in a bill in conformity thereto.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter addressed to him by William Blagrove, a clerk in the Navy Office, complaining of the suppression of a statement which he had made to the committee of investigation, detailing certain oppressive conduct of Benjamin Homans, chief clerk of the Navy Department, towards some of the clerks of that Department, which statement was reported to the House among the other documents and sent to the printer, among the others, but which does not appear in the printed report; which letter was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Secretary of State, made in obedience to a resolution of the 19th ultimo, respecting the distribution of the journals and documents published under a joint resolution of December 27, 1813.

Mr. HERBERT, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill to authorize the sale of a part of the Glebe of Rock Creek Church, in the District of Columbia; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the committee to whom was referred a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Maryland, reported a joint resolution directing the completion of the survey of the waters of Chesapeake Bay, and for the establishment of naval arsenals; which was twice read, and ordered for a third reading.

Mr. H. NELSON, from the Judiciary Committee, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate to increase the compensation of certain Judges of the United States, reported the same without amendment; when—

Mr. NELSON moved that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. TAYLOR moved that the bill be laid on the table; which motion was negatived; and,

The question being taken on Mr. NELSON's motion, it was decided in the affirmative, yeas 68, nays 40, and the bill accordingly postponed indefinitely.

The bill to regulate the staff of the Army, was read a third time, and passed, as amended by the House, and returned to the Senate for concurrence in the amendments.

The engrossed bill to provide for erecting additional buildings for the accommodation of the Executive Departments, and the engrossed bill for the relief of Thomas Miller and Stephen Baker, were severally read a third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate to make valid certain acts of the Justices of the Peace in the District of Columbia, was taken up, and, being amended, was ordered to be read a third time.

NAVY PENSION FUND.

Mr. TALLMADGE submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy cause to be laid before this House, a report of the state and condition of the Navy Pension Fund—the sources from whence it arises—its amount, and the manner in which it is collected—specifying the sums received yearly from each State, from and after the 20th of June, 1812—and, also, all the information in his possession beneficial to the said fund; and, in particular, that he state the sums received from the district courts of each State, the particular cases from which they arise, and the state of the returns made from each court—the names of the persons, if any, in default in the performance of their duties in regard to the said fund, or in making legal returns thereof; and any proceedings had thereon to enforce performance, and the nature and time of such proceedings.

Mr. TALLMADGE said, in offering this resolution to the consideration of the House, it was a duty for him to state, that the present law required the Secretary of the Navy to report annually to this House the state of the Navy pension fund. This had been done so far as a report stating the amount of the fund, and the manner of its investment in stock, and the names of the pensioners, which was giving little or no information. Mr. T. said he had this session made an ineffectual endeavor to obtain a pension for the widow and infant child of Captain Lawrence. He could not, because of the state of the Navy fund; he had searched into that fund; he was happy to say the clerk (Mr. Homans) had given him every aid. The state of his health had prevented him from completing the search, and communicating to this House the result at an earlier day. He was now compelled to say the fund was in a bad situation, and it appeared to be most shamefully neglected, if not abused. Mr. T. said the fund arose principally from the one half-part of prize causes; that the money from prizes came into the several district courts; that the officers of the courts had kept the captors quiet by paying over to them their one-half; while the charitable fund belonging to the Navy pensioners had, as appeared by the absence of all accounts, been a fund not paid over, if not squandered, and he feared frequent frauds had been practised. He said, he was informed at the office that the clerks of the district courts of the different States had neglected to make the returns, as required by law. They had paid over money in some instances, as if to quiet public inquiry. That, to remedy these defalcations, a law was passed in April, 1816, requiring returns from the clerks, and making it the duty of the Judges to do what they were before bound to do to attend to the conduct of clerks appointed by themselves; and the law also enjoined the district attorneys to prosecute in case of default of the clerks to make returns and payments. Mr. T. said he was informed there had not been a single return in conformity to the law, and but very few of the courts had made any payments. The books of the Navy Department, in this respect, were all in disorder and confusion, and gave me no satisfactory information of the state of the pension fund; and must always be and continue in that situation, until proper returns and accounts were enforced. Mr. T. then went into an examination of several cases where there appeared good reason to believe there had been great defaults, if not great frauds. Among the cases mentioned, the Susannah was one; it appeared this vessel was a prize to the Constitution; that the captors had received, in 1815, about thirty thousand dollars for their one-half; that no information was given to the Navy fund of the prize; and, after a long time, the clerk of the Navy fund heard of the prize, and claimed the proceeds, and after various delays he had obtained about twenty-two thousand dollars. The balance was detained under the name of a neutral claim; thus (if a genuine claim) taking it wholly from the pension fund. Mr. T. said it was time this House gave their attention to this subject. If the judges of the courts, who appoint their clerks, had been inattentive to the performance of their duties, they required the attention of this House; if the district attorneys had been inattentive to these defaults, and had not prosecuted as required by law, they required the censure of the Executive; if the Commissioners of the Pension Fund had been inattentive, and had allowed this fund to be the subject of abuse, and the books to stand open and in confusion, from the want of proper returns, without apprizing the Executive of these abuses, with a view to their correction, then most certainly they were in fault. Mr. T. said that the evils certainly required a remedy; there was wrong somewhere; the records of the Navy fund confirmed the dissatisfaction; and he hoped the House would be willing to attend to the subject, and pass the resolution now submitted.

The resolution was agreed to.

NIAGARA CLAIMS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of the sufferers on the Niagara frontier. Mr. SLOCUM's motion to strike out the first section of the bill being under consideration—

Mr. SPENCER made a motion, which he presumed would supersede the motion to strike out the first section, to wit: to strike out all the bill after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

"That the claims arising under the ninth section of the act, entitled 'An act to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed, while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes,' passed April 9, 1816, shall be adjusted and settled by the Third Auditor, under the directions of the Secretary of War, upon the principles contained in said act, and the amount thereof, when so settled, shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated; and that all evidence taken under any commissions issued by Richard B. Lee, Esq., in support of such claims, be transmitted to the said Third Auditor, for his information.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said act 'to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed, while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes,' except so much thereof as authorizes the appointment of a Commissioner, be, and the same is hereby continued in force for one year from and after the passing of this act; and that all claims arising under the said act, other than those hereinbefore provided for, whether the same have or have not been reported to Congress, shall be adjusted and settled by the said Third Auditor, under the direction of the Secretary of War; and the amount thereof, when so ascertained, shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

The CHAIRMAN decided this motion out of order; and the question recurred on striking out the first section.

Mr. RICH opposed the motion, not that he believed the claims came fairly under the act of April, 1816; but, if they did, he was for indemnifying them.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, spoke at much length in opposition to the bill, and to the propriety of paying the Niagara claims.

Mr. COMSTOCK supported, at some length, the justice of these claims, and the propriety of paying them.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, followed very earnestly on the same side.

Mr. CLAY also advocated warmly the justice of these claims, the obligation of the Government to indemnify the sufferers, and the policy of so doing.

Mr. HARRISON spoke on some incidental points, and in favor of the claimants.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, replied to some of Mr. WILLIAMS's remarks, and in support of the propriety of indemnifying the sufferings of exposed citizens on the frontiers; and incidentally on the delay which had taken place in deciding on similar claims from Louisiana.

Mr. FORSYTH opposed the bill, and spoke at some length against the expediency of paying the claims when

The question was taken on striking out the first section, and decided in the negative—ayes 57 noes 66.

Mr. GORDEN made an unsuccessful motion to refer the adjudication of all these claims to the Third Auditor of the Treasury.

Mr. REED, of Maryland, moved to add the following as a new section to the bill.

"And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War, upon application of any person or persons, or the legal representative or representatives of any person or persons, residing or who did reside upon the Chesapeake bay, or the waters emptying therein, having property burned, destroyed, or carried away, by the enemy during the late war, shall appoint two proper and discreet persons, resident of the neighborhood where such property was burned, destroyed, or carried away, who, after having duly sworn before some person having competent authority to administer an oath, shall value and assess the damage sustained by such person or persons, by reason of any burning, destroying, or carrying away, of any property, as aforesaid, which valuation and assessment, made as aforesaid, shall be certified and returned, under hand and seal, by the persons making the same, with the certificate of the persons before whom the oath was administered thereunto annexed, to the Secretary of the Treasury, who is hereby directed and required to report all and every such case to Congress within ten days after the commencement of the next session, stating distinctly the cases and the amount of each: Provided, That any valuation which hath heretofore been made and certified by two or more discreet persons, acting under the obligations of an oath, shall, when returned to the Secretary of War conformably to the provisions of this act, be held as valid as if the same had been made under the provisions herein contained, anything in the law to the contrary notwithstanding."

On motion of Mr. COLSTON, the amendment was modified, with the consent of Mr. REED, by striking out its limitation to the citizens on the waters of the Chesapeake, and to make it applicable to all citizens of the United States, or the Territories thereof, residing therein."

Mr. CLAY, though willing to indemnify the sufferers on the Chesapeake as well as the others, if brought forward separately, opposed this section, inasmuch as it would endanger the claims which have now been investigated, and were ready for decision, and which he was anxious to see allowed, &c.

Mr. FORSYTH moved to strike out that part of the amendment which refers the cases to the Secretary of the Treasury, down to the proviso, and insert the following:

"To the Secretary of War, and the same, if approved, shall be paid for when so returned by the Secretary of War, at the rate fixed by the preceding section of this act, fifty per cent. for houses destroyed, and thirty per cent. for personal property burnt, destroyed, or carried away, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

This motion was agreed to—ayes 54 noes 53.

Mr. MERCER spoke at some length in favor of relieving and indemnifying all sufferers alike, and against the propriety of extending remuneration to the Niagara sufferers, to the exclusion of those who had, on the waters of Virginia and elsewhere, suffered all the evils and horrors of war in the late contest.

Mr. CLAY replied to some of Mr. MERCER's arguments, and again advocated the indemnification of the Niagara sufferers, whose claims had been audited and investigated by Commissioners appointed for that purpose, and against now attaching any other cases, however just they might hereafter prove to be, and to which he was friendly; as such a course would, instead of relieving others, only defeat the present bill, which course was unfair, &c.

After a great deal of desultory discussion, the question was taken on Mr. REED's amendment, and agreed to—ayes 65, noes 55.

The Committee rose, and reported the bill to the House as amended; and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, April 9.

Mr. SEYBERT, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, reported a bill for erecting a light-house upon Galloo island, near the outlet of Lake Ontario; for placing sundry spin-dles or buoys, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The amendment to the bill for the relief of Josiah Bullock was concurred in, and it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

SURVIVING OFFICERS, &c., OF THE REVOLUTION.

Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on so much of the President's Message as relates to military affairs, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for rewarding such meritorious officers and soldiers of the Revolution (as well of the militia as the regular army) as may not be embraced within the provisions of the act passed at this session of Congress, to provide for certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary Army.

Mr. HOLMES said, when the act for the relief of the unfortunate heroes of the Revolution passed, it was apprehended by its friends that many meritorious men, both of the army and militia, would be excluded from its provisions. The bill went from this House to the Senate in rather a crude state; and it was so severely opposed and criticised there, that, when it returned here with its amendments, its friends feared to propose any alterations, lest, on a disagreement between the two Houses, the bill should be lost. It was however expected, that from applications under the act, cases would be developed which would require a supplementary act. Cases, he was told, had occurred, and others would probably occur, which would prove the necessity of providing for others who have claims on the justice of their country for Revolutionary services. Many he said were illy paid; and many, though not reduced in their circumstances, have strong claims on the justice and gratitude of their country. He had, therefore, prepared the resolution which he had offered, and proposed to have it committed to the Committee on Military Affairs. He was not sanguine that anything could be matured this session, but he wished to call the attention of the Committee to the subject, that some progress might be made in it, and that, at the next session, the provision required by the resolution might be made. At that time he promised to show to the House, that many not included in the late act are entitled to their country's consideration.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the resolution, and decided in the negative.

tier, by the ravages of the enemy in the late war, the question being on concurring in the amendment adopted by the Committee on the motion of Mr. REED.

After a good deal of debate, in which Mr. RICH, opposed concurring in the amendment; and Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, and REED supported it; and after some additional remarks by Mr. SPENCER, in support of the Niagara claims, the amendment was concurred in without a division.

The bill was further amended, on motion of Mr. RICH, by excluding from the provisions thereof all articles of trade or merchandise.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and decided in the negative—yeas 51, nays 91, as follows:

CASE OF R. W. MEADE.

The House, on motion of Mr. TRIMBLE, took up the report of the select committee on the resolution of the 12th February, and the memorial of sundry citizens of Philadelphia, respecting the imprisonment of Richard W. Meade, by the Spanish Government. The report concludes with recommending to the House the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House is satisfied that the imprisonment of Richard W. Meade is an act of cruel and unjustifiable oppression; that it is the right and duty of the Government of the United States to afford to Mr. Meade its aid and protection; and that this House will support and maintain such measures as the President may hereafter adopt, to obtain the release of the said R. W. Meade from confinement, should such measures be proper and necessary.

The resolution having been read, Mr. TRIMBLE proposed the following substitute therefor, by way of amendment:

Resolved, That the demand made by the President of the United States upon the King of Spain for the liberation of Richard W. Meade, a citizen of the United States, detained in confinement at the Castle of Santa Catalina, at Cadiz, ought to be supported and enforced, by vesting in the President an authority to make reprisal upon a Spanish Consul, in the event of a failure on the part of Spain promptly to discharge the said Meade.

Mr. TRIMBLE rose, in support of his motion, and addressed the House as follows:

If I may find favor in the sight of the House, I would ask a short indulgence at their hands. I know how much they are exhausted in the consideration of various complicated questions, touching our internal prosperity and exterior relations; and I am more than sensible of my utter inability to repay their attention with a fair equivalent.

The resolution reported by the committee is, in my opinion, unequal to the emergency of the case—I would prefer a stronger measure. Had the vindication of this amendment fallen to the lot of some members whom I could designate, they would tell us a round, unvarnished tale, that would nail us to our places—a tale that would “rouse the slumbering dead to hear.” They would show you a captive through the gratings of his prison window; that captive a citizen and brother, your agent and vice consul, languishing in a foreign dungeon, unpitied and forgotten; secluded from the cheerful light of day; bereft of all the endearments of social life—the solace of children, wife, and friends, and peaceful home—pining and wasting away in misery and despair, with but one solitary ray of hope, “that gleams from the star-spangled banner which waves over the land of the free and the home of the brave.” But I have no thoughts that scald, or words that burn, or plaintive tones of supplication, that would wring reluctant succor and compassion from Congress and the nation. Mine are humble powers, that have no eloquence of speech, save what the subject lends to grace its memory. Let no man judge me of meaning more than I explain. In the full spirit of candor, I declare, before the highest of all tribunals—the Judge of quick and dead—that, if I know myself, there is no temptation which would induce me to do a deed that would bring dishonor on my country; and I swear by all that is sacred in me, that in my opinion we are bound in duty, in justice, and in honor, to give this citizen immediate succor, even at the hazard of our lives. Suppose a change of cases, and I and you, and all of us would ask it and expect it. Let us remember the golden rule of him who spake as never man spake—let us do to others as we would have them do to us; for on this hangs the duty of the nation. If the measure which I offer and advocate is dangerous or premature, there is a redeeming spirit in the superior wisdom and better judgment of the House, which will shield us from its consequences; and I am sure there is a fund of charity within these walls, that will forgive the well-meant, but mistaken zeal, which may lead me beyond the boundary of cold caution.

Permit me to waste a few moments in glancing over the facts, as reported. I intend to rely entirely on the evidence of the Spanish documents, and for that reason shall omit many considerations which give a favorable color to the case; as, for instance, Mr. Meade's loan of forty thousand dollars in cash to the Regency, to assist them in suppressing a mutiny of the troops at Cadiz; the enormous sum of more than half a million which they owe him for property sold the Government; and the fact of his being put under military guard until his warehouses were pillaged, by order of the Regency, because he refused to sell any more property, flour, tobacco, &c., until he could get pay for what they already owed him. Let these, and many others like them, pass for nothing. The naked case is this: Mr. Meade held in his hands about fifty-two thousand dollars, as trustee under the bankrupt laws of Spain, subject to the direction and control of the Consulado at Cadiz. One Glass claimed this money for himself; and one Hunter, by his agent, (McDermot,) also claimed it. The Consulado ordered the money to be paid to McDermot, on condition that he would give security. This he failed to do, and the Consulado suddenly made an order, directing Mr. Meade to deposit the sum in the King's treasury. He made the deposit, in “effective specie,” which the same treasury owed him, viz: in libramientos—that is, treasury notes or cash scrip. These treasury notes may have been at a discount in the market, but that could make no difference; for it would have been more than dishonest in the treasury to refuse its own paper, because it was at a discount. Between Meade and the treasury there was no ground of complaint, and could be none; for, if he had paid the deposit in specie, the treasurer must have instantly repaid it to him, in discharge of the libramientos—that is, treasury notes—and the result would be exactly the same. And as Meade was then pressing the treasurer to pay his cash scrip, it is easy to see that the treasurer obtained a respite from further importunity, until Glass or Hunter should call for the money, at the end of their law-suit.

Some time after this, McDermot brought suit against Mr. Meade for the same sum, before the same court. He pleaded their order and the deposit in the King's treasury, and vouched the treasury to respond the money; but the court gave judgment that he should pay again. He appealed at the Alzadas, and the cause was withdrawn from that court by the Council of War, at the instance of McDermot; and it is still pending before the Council of War. Mr. Meade petitioned the King against the oppressive conduct of that court, and the King ordered five new judges to be associated with the old ones, and directed that no proceedings should be had in the cause, in the absence of the new judges. McDermot suggested to the Council of War, that Meade was about to leave Spain, and the old judges, in the absence of the new ones, and contrary to the King's order, authorized the Consulado at Cadiz to hold Meade to security for the money; and the Consulado resolved, that the only security they would take, should be another deposit of the money in their Treasury. This Meade refused to do, and he was sent to the castle, and put in the felons' prison. Other aggravating facts and circumstances may be found in the documents sent by the President in his Message on this subject.

Our Minister near the Court of Madrid complained of these outrageous proceedings, as a violation of the 7th and 20th articles of the treaty of 1795, and also a violation of the laws and usages of Spain; and the King expressed his entire disapprobation of the conduct of the courts, and ordered that justice should be immediately done in the cause; but at the same time issued an order, directing the proceedings to be suspended as long as possible, suggesting as his reason for this, that in any event, his treasury must refund the deposit so soon as the cause should be decided; and that he had no money in his treasury to refund. This is said at the time when his Minister of Finance states in his exposé to the King, that the annual expense of the King's household amounts to seven millions of dollars. And this is what Don Onís calls “Immaculate Purity,” and I would say that it caps the climax of Spanish villany and treachery. I challenge all history to produce its parallel. Are we not bound to protect this citizen against such a flagrant outrage? I read in the books, that nations are in a state of nature, and have only two modes of compelling each other to do justice; war and reprisal. I say nothing of big words hung up in resolutions. They are the index of imbecility; the mask of cowardice. I abjure all hectoring, and gasconading, and gostering, between nations or individuals. In this case war would only increase the injury, by protracting the confinement. Reprisal is the only efficient remedy. The amendment before you proposes, that a law be passed, authorizing the President (in the event of a failure on the part of Spain, to liberate this citizen) to make reprisal by seizing a Spanish subject, a consul or vice consul, and confine him as a hostage. This will support the President in his late demand, and put a weapon in his hand, to chastise the insolence which Spain may offer to this Government in the reply which she may make. So far as precedent goes, this amendment is supported by the law of 1799, which authorized and required the President, ADAMS, to make reprisals upon French citizens in the cases there mentioned. If examples are called for, they are to be found in the history of every nation. The world would never be at peace, if all causes of complaint were redressed by war. Humanity and sound policy approve the practice of reprisals, and require that it should sometimes be resorted to. Why should a nation change its peaceful habits, and gird on the armor of war, and waste millions to obtain redress for an injury, which can be redressed by the seizure and confinement of a single individual? Would you spill the blood and squander the treasure of your own people, where redress can be obtained by the pressure of coercion on the people of your adversary? Shall this outrage be placed upon the calendar of grievances, to be discussed upon thirteen years' forbearance? Promptitude is justice in a case like this. If it must terminate in a war of words, we have proof positive, that Mr. Adams can drive Don Onis from the field of battle; but, in my opinion, we have retreated far enough from Spain; and unless we make a stand upon reprisal, we shall take shelter behind the ramparts of disgrace.

Perhaps it would be well, he said, to pretermitt the reading of authorities; but here is something so exactly to the purpose, that he would ask the House to hear it: Vattel, page 283, section 341: "Where a sovereign is not satisfied with the manner in which his subjects are treated by the laws and customs of another nation, he is at liberty to declare that he will treat the subjects of that nation in the same manner as his are treated. This is what is called retortion. There is nothing in this but what is conformable to justice and sound policy. No one can complain on receiving the same treatment which he gives to other." Again, same book, page 285, sec. 351: "As we may seize the things which belong to a nation, in order to compel her to do justice, we may equally, for the same reason, arrest some of her citizens, and not release them till we have full satisfaction." And again, same book, p. 262, sec. 71: "Whoever uses a citizen ill, directly offends the State, which is bound to protect this citizen; and the sovereign of the latter should avenge his wrongs, punish the aggressor, and, if possible, oblige him to make full reparation, since otherwise the citizen would not attain the great end of the civil association, which is safety." He would refer gentlemen to page 5, sec. 17, and page 288, sec. 354, same book. These passages, he said, would show that the amendment before the House came clearly within the scope and sanction of the law of nations. But, for his part, although he gave full credence to able writers on such subjects, yet he relied much more on common sense and practical experience. The great volume of nature was the work from which he drew his lessons of instruction; these books he considered as only commentaries on the text. We must look behind the chronicles of nations for the principles which gave birth to their existence, or the necessities which suggested their variety of laws and usages.

Formerly the States could protect their citizens by reprisal. In the formation of the Constitution they surrendered the right to the General Government. Are you not bound in duty to use all the powers thus solemnly granted to you and inhibited to them? Can the duty of this nation to protect its citizens be made a question? Can you alienate a part of your territory? Can you denationalize a citizen? Can the nation abandon a citizen without his consent? The primary object of the social compact is personal safety and protection. In the formation of that compact, each individual surrenders his natural right of self protection, on condition that he shall be protected by the whole strength of the community. Allegiance and protection are coeval and coextensive. If you claim, or have a right to claim, the one, the citizen has a right to claim the other; they are one and indivisible. What are the obligations of this Government to its citizens? Upon what basis is it founded? Was it erected upon a system of time-serving policy, or did the wise framers of the Constitution dig deep, and lay its foundation sure—upon immutable principles of justice and of rights? Let us analyze the Constitution; let it speak for itself: listen. "We, the people of the United States, surrender to you, the General Government, certain rights, and grant you certain powers. And what do you give us in return for these? A guarantee, a solemn compact on your part that you will insure to us equal rights, equal justice, and equal protection; promote our general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." Yes, sir, equal rights, to be secured by wise and wholesome laws; equal justice, to be administered by honest, upright judges; and equal protection to every citizen throughout the world: not, if you please, on courtesy or favor, but on compulsion, on solemn compact; not when you please, at your convenience, but promptly when demanded, and to be enforced, when necessary, by the whole power of the community. Will any man deny these principles? Who dare deny them? I arraign the counter-pleader at your bar, (the table;) put him upon his oath, and leave him to his country, his conscience, and his God. Such a statesman would be banished from this House by the ostracism of public opinion, and his return perpetually interdicted by the non-intercourse of general detestation.

What is the general welfare of the nation but a sum total of benefits, composed of items, solemnly promised to each citizen to be sacredly performed? What are the blessings of liberty? Are they empty sounds and tinkling cymbals, or are they nouns substantive, that can be felt, and handled, and enjoyed?

There is one blessing of liberty which stands pre-eminent above the rest—it is personal protection! Has this citizen enjoyed that blessing, or has he been visited by the bitterest curses that unrelenting vengeance could inflict upon an offending victim? These venal and corrupt ministers, these panders for royalty, have caused him to be torn, lawlessly, from his family and friends, and thrown into the dungeon assigned for malefactors. Baseness, fraud, and perfidy, formed an unholy league with avarice, ingratitude, and malice, to wring from him his property and smother his complaints; and the laws of Spain, subsisting treaties, and the sacred usages of nations, were but ropes of sand in the hands of these myrmidons of power. They have made him drink of the cup of bitterness even to the dregs; and it is left for you to return the poisoned chalice to the lips of his oppressors. The present generation will not forget this flagrant outrage on our Consul, and history may record the infamy of the Spanish Ministers; and that infamy I would save Pizarro; he alone seems to have urged his master to redress the injury as speedily as possible. I hope I do not mistake his good intentions; but, sir, I could not swear for him; I should be loth to stand compurgator for good faith, honesty, and fair dealing in any Spanish Minister. Who would have expected such injustice and outrage at the hand of Ferdinand VII? In the late struggles and convulsions which agitated the Spanish monarchy, and indeed all Europe, it was not expected that our neutral rights would pass unassailed, and we have not been wanting in patient forbearance, while imperious necessity could be urged as an apology for violations of public faith; but, when the world was permitted to take rest, and repose itself in peace, under the auspices of the high contracting Powers; when the Holy Alliance had guaranteed the rights of nations, all mankind had expected full and ample justice at the hand of the legitimate sovereigns. As Ferdinand of Spain had, in the general conflict, suffered most from the lawless hand of power; as he had been decoyed from his home, treacherously torn from his country by a foreign despot, and made to suffer a long and painful imprisonment, it was expected, on his restoration, that he would hasten to lay open his own dungeons, set free his prisoners, and give examples of justice and good faith to surrounding nations. As he knew, from experience, the value of personal liberty to himself, (and who should know better than he?) the world had done him the honor to hope and believe that he would hold sacred and inviolate the personal liberty of others. How delusive the hope, how vain the expectation! Poverty made him avaricious, oppression taught him cruelty, and experience, that able teacher, that whip of scorpions, learned him no lessons of wisdom, of moderation, or forbearance. His Ministers have brought this case to a crisis. Our national honor is involved; you must demand reparation in firm language, and enforce it with strong measures, or your boasted birth-right will be sold in European markets for a mess of pottage. There is some virtue in retortion and reprisal. What can words avail us? Is it not disgraceful to crave imparlance in a case like this? Will you sacrifice the honor of your country, violate your duty, and abandon this citizen to his fate; or will you stand up, all as one man, to enforce his liberation, and compel justice to be done him? It is in vain to temporize with the treachery of Spain; let us make assurance doubly sure; let us have redress—peaceably if we can, forcibly if we must.

When I had the honor of presenting the resolution for reprisals, some objection arose because it did not define the nature and extent of reprisals meditated. In this amendment I have attempted to obviate the objection. But it is due, in candor to the House and nation, that I should so explain myself that no one can mistake me. In the event of a failure on the part of Spain to surrender Mr. Meade, upon the late demand, I would seize a Spanish subject and Consul, of equal property and respectability, as a hostage; confine him at Castle William, in the harbor of Boston, and treat him, in all respects, as it shall be made to appear that our citizen is treated at the Castle of Santa Catalina. That would be equal justice subject for citizen, Consul for Consul, castle for castle, and treatment for treatment. No, sir, I humbly crave the pardon of my country—that would not be equal justice—for as "one day, one hour, of virtuous liberty is worth a whole eternity of bondage," so, also, one honest, upright, independent freeman is worth a kingdom, an empire, of servile, crouching, sycophantic Spanish slaves.

I will not say that this amendment has been drawn up with all the skill and scholar-craft which might have been employed in its production; but I will boldly affirm that the redress which it indicates, is more than justified by the case, and fully supported by the laws and usages of nations. I know not what others may think on this subject, but, for myself, I have no hope of redress but from coercion—for that sovereign who forfeits his word of honor, and brings his reputation and his justice into question, will not easily unhand his victim, or forego his vengeance. I am, therefore, bold to say that I will use retortion. The States surrendered to the General Government the right of making reprisals; and, in their name, I ask you to exercise the power—I demand it in the name of the people. Gentlemen may shake their heads, if they mean to say that the demand is too broad—that I have no right to speak for them, and their States. Then, sir, I demand it in the name of the people whom I represent—in the name of the State from whence I come. I know them, and can speak for them—I know their love of liberty and hatred of oppression, and will answer for their readiness to support the honor of the country, and their promptitude in chastising all infractions of personal liberty.

Mr. Speaker: The shocking and cold blooded massacre of your gallant relation, Captain Hart, and others, after the battle of the river Raisin, is too certain to admit of doubt. But, let it be once officially known that they are still living, lingering out a hopeless existence, under savage restraint, and your State would demand reprisal and retaliation of Congress, in a tone respectful, I trust, but not equivocal; and if you should refuse, the people of that State would rise en masse, and the whole power of this Government would be utterly unable to suspend the blow of retaliation which would fall on the savage tribes. I should be ashamed—I would feel myself dishonored—were I capable of withholding that succor and protection from the citizens of the seaboard, which I would extend to the inhabitants of the West: and yet, the Indian prison is but a boundless wilderness, and the only fetters which he uses, is the hazard of starvation to the prisoner who escapes. Hard and hopeless as this condition is, who would exchange it for the gloomy horrors of a Spanish dungeon, where each succeeding day brings an accumulating load of misery and wretchedness, and each long, lingering night is spent in breathless agony, listening to the "stealthy tread" of the hired assassin, coming to earn his bloody wages—a dungeon where unseen poison may lay the prisoner on his bed of straw; or the treacherous stiletto nail him to the midnight floor.

If it shall appear to the House, as it does to me, from the report of the committee, that this citizen has been incarcerated contrary to the laws of Spain, subsisting treaties, and the usages of nations—if he has been lawlessly torn from his wife and family, and thrown into the felons' prison—if that wife, that heart-broken woman, after seeking an asylum for herself and children, in her native land of liberty, has ventured to supplicate your succor and protection for her suffering husband—if the sovereign, who has visited him and his with this cup of bitterness, has acknowledged, under his own hand, by his public order, that there is no cause for the outrage—if, in point of fact, the same sovereign did, by his secret order, direct the proceedings to be delayed as long as possible, because his treasury was not prepared to respond the deposit—if, in fine, this case of unparalleled duplicity, and fraud, and treachery, and unwarranted oppression, is believed, and stands uncontradicted, where is the man of feeling that would hesitate to make reprisal? If there breathes a man so utterly devoid of sympathy, may woman's malediction light upon his head. And where shall the woman of feeling be found, who would sigh on the colorless lips of her husband, while his mouth is polluted with a chilling, cold-hearted No?

Sir, said he, Freedom and Protection are twin brothers, born in one day, and Freedom, the elder, and more terrible to tyrants; so long as he breathes, despots would rather grasp the forked lightning, than lay their unhallowed hands upon his younger brother; so soon as you fail to protect, we cease to be free; all that is left us, is but shadow, the substance lies buried in a Spanish dungeon. Abandon this citizen, and you set a precedent—I dread, a precedent which violates good faith. At first, such precedents may be only vices; but when, by force of custom and repetition, they become fixed habit, the disease is desperate and incurable. For although

"Vice is a monster of such horrid mien,
As to be hated, needs but to be seen;
Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace."

Sir, such foul, unnatural precedents will blast your rising fame, as the Bohun Upas blasts its heath of surrounding desolation. Examples so utterly hostile to the genius of our Government, foretell the decay of public virtue. They proclaim the tree of liberty doated at the heart. The strength of the Government lies in the confidence of the nation; but public opinion will hesitate and falter the moment we betray our trust, by deserting a citizen in the hour of danger. No man can tell with what particle of air a pestilence begins; and no statesman can foresee what breach of faith will cut the cords of confidence, and palsy the affections of the people. I hope we shall do our duty promptly, as becomes the character of freemen, proud of our country's honor, and our rights; and then, let what may happen, we can sleep with quiet consciences.

Mr. HOPKINSON, of Pennsylvania, expressed his belief, that the report of the committee went as far as the duty of this House required it to go in such a matter. There was a limit beyond which it was improper to go, in an affair intrusted to the Executive; and Mr. H. hoped, that what had been done by the Executive would be found amply sufficient for all the purposes of this case. The first movement in this business had been made by this House; the President had, in consequence thereof, opened a correspondence with the Spanish Minister in a very decided and dignified manner; and the report of the committee is, that this House will support the Executive in any further measures to obtain the release of Mr. Meade, which shall be just and necessary. In doing more than this, at present, Mr. H. asked if the House might not proceed without distinctly seeing the result? But Mr. H. wished to see something of the practical effect of the proposition; with that, the gentleman had not favored the House. The resolution offered by the gentleman from Kentucky authorized the President to make reprisal for the imprisonment of Mr. Meade—to seize a Spanish subject, and confine him in prison until Meade shall be released. Now Mr. H. denied that this Congress could give the President any such despotic power. Every man in this country, whether foreigner or citizen, is under the protection of the laws. Who was the President to select for reprisal? Shall he, as is suggested, by some unknown process, seize a Consul, living under our laws, and lodge him in jail, uncharged with debt, or crime, or any violation whatever of the laws of the land? If despotic Governments do these things, we should avoid, not follow, the example. We, said Mr. H., must follow the course of the laws, and cannot depart from it. There was no process, he said, by which a man could be seized and imprisoned in this country, because a citizen was improperly imprisoned in a foreign country. There was nothing in the laws of nations, or our own laws, to justify it. The case quoted by Mr. TRIMBLE was an authority given to the President to make reprisals when we were actually in a state of war. Such acts might be proper in a time of war, but not in a time of peace like the present. Mr. H. admonished the House not to stretch this thing too far, in their anxiety to obtain justice for the citizen in question. He knew Mr. Meade and his family, and his feelings were as strongly excited to their sufferings as any gentleman's; and he wished to do everything to produce his liberation which was consistent with propriety. Did the gentleman mean to make this a subject for war? Yet there was no act beyond the one proposed by him but war. What precedent, or law, Mr. H. asked, could the gentleman find for the reprisal he recommended, and what would prevent the judges from discharging any man, brought up by habeas corpus, from such an arrest? Mr. H. contended, that the report of the committee was sufficient for the present, and went far enough. Hereafter, after it was seen what effect the President's remonstrance should produce, stronger measures might be taken, if it should be found necessary—even war itself.

Mr. HARRISON, of Ohio, thought the gentleman from Pennsylvania might have found a precedent for the resolution offered by Mr. TRIMBLE. He had never read the law himself, but he had often heard of an act called the alien law, passed in the Administration of Mr. Adams, by which the President was authorized to seize the subject of any foreign Government, and send him out of the country. If the House could give such a power as this to the Executive, it surely could confer the power proposed in the resolution. The Constitution intended to guard the citizen against the encroachment of his own Government, and this House possessed the power to protect our citizens, and, in doing so, even to send the Minister of Spain or any other out of the country. As to the proposition itself, Mr. H. would merely say, that Congress owed it to the nation not to adjourn without doing something effectual to produce the liberation of Mr. Meade from his long and cruel imprisonment. He was not confined for any crime but that of being an American citizen—that, said Mr. H., which was the protection of a Roman citizen, is with an American a cause of injury; and Mr. H. declared he would go to any measure short of war, to release the citizen in question. The proposition of Mr. TRIMBLE he thought the safe and proper way of proceeding, and the only one that could answer the end in view.

Mr. TRIMBLE, in reply to Mr. HOPKINSON, said, he could not doubt the power of the Government to protect a citizen, even by making reprisals on the subjects of the Government holding our citizens in bondage. The representatives of foreign Governments were protected by our laws from violent outrage, but still they were responsible agents, and the law of this country could seize upon a Spanish Consul, or anybody else; the law was sovereign, and could do anything within our own limits but exceed the pale of the Constitution; then make a law for the case, and every foreigner as well as citizen must submit to it. The reverse of this, Mr. T. said, would be a monstrous doctrine—for it was impossible to believe that the Constitution would have left the Government without this power of protecting our citizens from foreign violence: and, though he had more than common confidence in the opinions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, he must still contend that the proposed measure would be perfectly Constitutional. As to the law which had been referred to, Mr. T. said it was an act to authorize the Executive to make reprisals upon French subjects in a time of peace. The gentleman shakes his head, said Mr. T., but were we, he asked, more at war with France then than we are with Spain now? Has not Spain violently seized a national ship, the Firebrand, and committed many acts of hostility more than we received from France in 1799? Yet reprisals were authorized against French subjects, and he read the act to show that it was a measure fully as strong as the one he now proposed. As to the mode of executing the measure, Mr. T. said there would be no difficulty in doing a thing of this kind; it might be done by application to a court of justice, or by directing the Attorney General to proceed against the person selected, &c.

Mr. SERGEANT, of Pennsylvania, observed that, if there was no other objection to this resolution, it was inexpedient because not calculated to produce the effect proposed. As to the act of 1799, authorizing the Executive to retaliate on citizens of the French Republic, that act was preceded by a series of hostile acts which had brought us into a state of war with France, very different from the present state of our affairs with Spain. Our commercial intercourse was suspended with France, letters of marque were issued, and her vessels brought in for condemnation; and it had very lately been judicially decided by the Supreme Court, in a case before that tribunal, that this was an act of war against France. To justify the proposed measure by precedent, it was necessary to bring forward a case of reprisals being authorized in a state of profound peace. But this, Mr. S. said, was not the only objection. It was the worst measure that could be adopted, contemplating, as it must, one of two results. If you seek satisfaction by arresting a Spanish Consul, you must remain satisfied with that act of retaliation. What satisfaction would this be to Mr. Meade, or how would it bring about his liberation? But you have then taken your satisfaction, and if it does not operate in favor of Mr. Meade, does it in favor of your character? Would not that character, on the contrary, suffer injury from such a step? Certainly it would, Mr. S. said, and he protested against this doctrine of taking an equivalent by seizing an innocent man, throwing him in jail, and there keeping him until the Spanish Government should feel sufficient interest in him to liberate Meade. But, take the next view of the case. Suppose you don't mean to be satisfied with this step, if it should not produce the effect of restoring Meade to liberty; are you prepared to follow up the measure with war? Considered in either view, Mr. S. thought the measure injudicious. Besides, he said if we take this step, it puts us on bad ground; because, by taking satisfaction violently before we seek it peaceably, it places the country in an arrogant posture in the view of the world. There should be but one step taken in a course of this kind; do not take this first, and then the ulterior measure of war. No, if war was intended, go to it at once, and not begin by the paltry act of imprisoning a Spanish subject. There was a wide difference between an act of retaliation in time of peace and war. In the latter it was a measure in terrorem, to prevent unjust acts on the part of the enemy. The Executive had demanded the liberation of Meade, and it was proper to wait the answer of Spain. The way for the Legislature to proceed in the mean time, was to announce to Spain, that if justice be not done to our citizen, we will then support the Executive in any proper measures he may take to enforce it; not go forward first and tell the Executive what that course must be. A further objection to this course was, Mr. S. said, that we should enable Spain to keep the $52,000 in her Treasury which was withheld from Meade, just as long as she should prefer the money to the liberty of the subject whom we should imprison, and that, he believed, would be long enough; besides at the same time prolonging equally the confinement of Meade. Mr. S. concluded by expressing his respect for the honorable feelings which had actuated Mr. TRIMBLE in making this motion; but he was obliged to withhold his approbation from the proposition, as one which his judgment could not sanction.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, would vote for this resolution, he said, because it does something, and against the other because it does nothing. He read the resolution reported by the committee, which declares that the imprisonment of Meade was an act of cruel and unjustifiable oppression. This, he said, was strong language; and what did the committee recommend to meet a case of this cruel and oppressive character? Why, simply, that they would support the Executive in any measures which he might deem proper to obtain redress. Mr. S. would act differently; he would not leave the affair to a war of words and threats and proclamations. The man had been imprisoned already two years, and was not this, Mr. S. asked, long enough? Is it not time to adopt some mode of enforcing his release? It was true, we had, in some cases, if injury, waited thirteen years, but should we be thus patient in every case, and let the present off with empty threats? He hoped not.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, said, he would vote against the amendment for exactly the same reasons as Mr. SPENCER had given for voting in its favor. The first resolution, Mr. W. thought, would go as far and do as much as was at present proper. It announces the determination of this House to support the President in any measures which he shall adopt to effect the object in view. What more could or ought the House to do? Shall we go to war? If gentlemen intend that, let them come forward, Mr. W. said, distinctly with the proposition. This House, he conceived, could not make a demand of the Spanish Government for the liberation of Meade; it would be going out of the line of their duty. It might simply declare its resolution to support the Executive measures, or it might authorize letters of marque and reprisal against Spanish subjects on the ocean; but it could not properly do the act proposed by the motion of Mr. TRIMBLE. Let us, he said, first see the effect of the Executive measures; if they fail, then it will be time enough to adopt the ulterior step.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, had no doubt of the power of the House to adopt the resolution proposed by Mr. TRIMBLE, and vest the President with all the authority that the law of nations allowed any nation to assume. But it did not follow, because we had the right that it was proper to exercise it; on the contrary, this would be opposing the injustice of a foreign Government, by committing an act of the same injustice ourselves. Was it right, he asked, to visit the practical sins of Spain upon unoffending persons in our power, or to treat unjustly, cruelly, and inhumanly, an innocent man residing here, because Spain had thus treated one of our citizens? In a state of war, Mr. F. said, retaliation was justifiable, but even then it could be justified by nothing but great necessity; then how much greater the necessity which would authorize it in a state of peace? Admitting that this measure was authorized, as he believed it was, by the law of nations, still we ought to reject it if it be inhuman and dishonorable. He condemned it, because it would imitate the improper conduct of another nation. We have, said Mr. F., the power to punish Spain herself; why not exercise that power, instead of resorting to an act of injustice upon her subjects here? If we are to do anything, let us do that which honor demands, and even break the Spanish monarchy to pieces, if necessary, to wrest justice from her. But there were other considerations to be taken into view. The crime of Meade was not that of being an American, as had been represented; but it appeared that, for some transactions in the course of his business, he had been imprisoned by the judicial tribunals of Spain. We say he is confined unjustly. Be it so. We pronounce the decision of the Spanish courts unjust, and what, said Mr. F., do we propose to do? To lay violent hands on an innocent man, without even consulting the courts of justice. All men residing in this country, Mr. F. said, were answerable to the civil tribunals, and they could be confined, and even put to death if the law demanded it; but would it be an act of justice to seize an innocent man, and punish him for the act of his Government? Put the case to ourselves, Mr. F. said. Suppose a Spanish subject, residing within the jurisdiction of one of the States, is arrested and imprisoned for some transaction by one of our courts, and Spain complains of this as an act of injustice, and demands that he be liberated from prison, or absolved from punishment for a violation of our laws, would this House think it right for Spain to imprison and punish one of our citizens, because it followed a bad example set by another nation? Let us not, said he, act in retaliation; do not seize a consul, or other Spanish subject; but if the House choose to adopt violent measures to effect Mr. Meade's liberation, there were other ample means to do it; lay not your hands on an innocent individual, but rather seize all her property within your reach, and hold it on condition of restoring it when Mr. Meade should be released. But Mr. F. thought the resolution of the select committee went far enough. This resolution, backed by the feeling produced throughout the country by the agitation of the subject, would, he believed, produce all the effect which would be produced by Mr. TRIMBLE's proposition; but, if we are to go any farther, do not, said Mr. F., copy the cruelty and injustice of the nation which we condemn.

Mr. TRIMBLE, in the course of some remarks in reply to Mr. FORSYTH, said, he hoped the gentleman would turn out to be a true prophet respecting the effect he anticipated from the combined operation of the resolution of the committee, and of the public feeling. But if this prophecy turned out no better than what the gentleman had, on another occasion, predicted, about showing the responsibility of the Spanish Government, he would advise him never to come beyond the Alleghany mountains in the character of a prophet. But, Mr. T. said, the gentleman from Georgia would change the Spanish Consul for Florida, and thus we should, in effect, sell the liberty of a citizen for a little paltry land. When, said Mr. T., I go to war, it shall be for Cuba. Cuba, said he, is the right arm of the United States, cut off, and Halifax or Nova Scotia the left, and they must one day be reunited. This, said he, is the minimum of our dreams of glory, and that American who thinks upon a smaller scale is unworthy of the name of statesman.

Mr. FORSYTH rose in reply, and, amongst other remarks, observed, that he had not played the part of a prophet. It was true, that he had on a former occasion intimated that he should endeavor to show that Spain was responsible. He regretted that he was denied the opportunity of doing so; but there was not a disposition in the House to make her responsible, or support him in the attempt; could he have done it, he would; but he had found the effort would be useless. As to the measure he had suggested, he would not, he said, exchange one free citizen for all the territory Spain possessed; but he had contended, and still thought, that the seizure of Spanish property, and holding it conditionally, would be more humane, and would produce the liberation of our citizen, and exact justice from Spain much sooner than the imprisonment of an innocent individual.

The question was then taken on Mr. TRIMBLE's substitute, and decided in the negative, only about fifteen rising in its favor; and the resolution reported by the select committee was agreed to without a division.

FRIDAY, April 10.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of Jonathan D. Mr. INGHAM, from the Committee on the Post Offices and Post Roads, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of permitting the Governors of States and Territories to receive and transmit through the post office all official communications free of postage, made a report thereon; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House as follows, to wit:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to extend the privilege of franking to the Chief Magistrates of States and Territories.

Mr. INGHAM, reported a bill to extend the privilege of franking to the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. DESHA, all the accounts and papers in the possession of the Clerk of this House, in relation to the accounts of James Thomas, a Quartermaster General in the army during the late war, were referred to the Attorney General of the United States.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill entitled "An act for the relief of Samuel F. Hooker," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill was read twice and referred to the Committee of Claims.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have disagreed to the amendment proposed by this House to the bill, entitled "An act to make valid certain acts of the justices of the peace in the District of Columbia." They have passed the bill, entitled "An act to provide for the publication of the laws of the United States, and for other purposes," with amendments. They have also passed bills of the following titles, viz: "An act for the relief of John Hall, late a major of marines;" and "An act in addition to an act to prohibit the introduction of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord, 1808, and to repeal certain parts of the same;" in which amendments and bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

CASE OF JUDGE VAN NESS.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Judiciary Committee, rose and stated that he was instructed by that committee to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the official conduct of William P. Van Ness, as Judge of the southern district of New York, with power to send for persons and papers; that the said committee shall continue during the present Congress, and may report at the present or ensuing session, by resolution or otherwise."

Mr. S. observed, that it would be recollected a resolution had passed the House early in the present session, directing the Judiciary Committee to inquire into the disposition of the funds of the district court of the southern district of New York. The committee had performed that duty, and had reported that the funds "had been nefariously purloined." In the course of the investigation, the conduct of the judge of the district had been somewhat implicated, but the committee considered themselves restricted by the resolution to the conduct of the clerk only. The committee, therefore, deemed it due to the character of the judge, as well as to the dignity of this House, that the inquiry should proceed, and that an opportunity should be given to the judge to vindicate himself.*

Mr. H. NELSON, of Virginia, moved to insert the name of William Stevens, judge of the district court of Georgia; which was carried.

Mr. FORSYTH moved to insert the name of Mathias B. Tallmadge, judge of the northern district of New York.

Mr. SPENCER cheerfully assented to the amendment, and stated as a reason for not originally introducing the name of Judge Tallmadge, that the resolution submitted by him seemed to be a necessary consequence of the resolution originally directing the inquiries of the Judiciary Committee; that Judge Tallmadge was anxious an inquiry should be made, and the introduction of his name would be gratifying to him.

A motion was made by Mr. FORSYTH, to give the committee power to sit during the recess; on which a discussion arose in which Mr. FORSYTH, Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, and Mr. MERCER, supported the motion; and Mr. STROTHER opposed it; and it was finally lost.

The resolution, as amended, was then agreed to, without a division, and a committee of five appointed; and Mr. SPENCER, Mr. HOPKINSON, Mr. LIVERMORE, Mr. WILLIAMS, of Connecticut, and Mr. BLOOMFIELD, were appointed the said committee.

FUGITIVES FROM JUSTICE.

A motion was made by Mr. PINDALL, that the House do now proceed to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate, to the bill, entitled "An act to provide for delivering up persons held to labor or service in any of the States or Territories, who shall escape into any other State or Territory:" And the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative—yeas 63, nays 73, as follows:

Abbott, Austin, Baldwin, Bassett, Bloomfield, Blount, Colston, Cook, Culbreth, Deaha, Earle, Floyd, Forney, Forsyth, Garnett, Hall of North Carolina, Herbert, Hogg, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Linn, Little, Lowndes, McCoy, Marchand, Mason of Massachusetts, Mercer, Middleton, Miller, Moore, Mumford, H. Smith, Ballard Smith, Alexander Smyth. J. S.

* J. C. SPENCER requests the editors of the Intelligencer to state, that the substance of his remarks on submitting the resolution of inquiry into the conduct of the judge of the southern district of New York, as published in that paper, has, as he is informed, been misunderstood. It was not intended by him to communicate the idea, that the Judiciary Committee thought there was evidence of criminality in Judge Van Ness, before the committee; such an idea would have been inconsistent with the sentiments expressed by the committee. He meant to be understood, that there was evidence which justified an inquiry, that was due as well to the judge as to the judicial character of the country.

NAVIGATION BILL.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate concerning navigation.

Mr. FORSYTH rose, and, having declared his preference for this bill over that reported in this House on the same subject, proceeded to support the bill in a speech of considerable length. Mr. F. did so in consideration of that bill having been already acted on in one branch of the Legislature, and of the extraordinary unanimity with which it had passed that branch; not that he thought it preferable to the bill reported by the Committee of Foreign Relations in the House; on the contrary, he believed the details of the latter bill better; but, under the circumstances mentioned above, and having the same object, he thought it advisable to pass the former.

Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, next rose, and intimating an intention to enter into the subject at a length too great to be completed to-day, (it being 4 o'clock,) a motion was made that the Committee rise, that Mr. H. might commence his remarks to-morrow; but the Committee refused, by a majority of 10, to rise. Mr. HOLMES then made his remarks in opposition to the bill, at some length. Mr. H. was followed by Mr. SILS-BEE and by Mr. CLAY, both decidedly in favor of the bill.

SATURDAY, April 11.

Mr. INGHAM, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing in one of the Western States a branch of the General Post Office, for the purpose of making contracts for the conveyance of the mail, and to correct abuses in that department, made a report unfavorable to such a measure; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill supplementary to the several acts making appropriations for the year 1818; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act confirming Anthony Cavalier and Peter Petit in their claim to a tract of land," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

The Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill to increase the duties on certain manufactured articles imported into the United States, were discharged, and the said bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill to increase the duties on iron in bars and bolts, iron in pigs, castings, nails, and alum, and to disallow the drawback of duties on the re-exportation of gunpowder.

Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, from the committee to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States of the 27th of March, 1818, and accompanying documents upon the subject of the expense incurred under the 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th articles of the Treaty of Ghent, with instructions to inquire into the nature and causes of said expenses, and into the principles upon which the Commissioners under the 6th and 7th articles of said treaty have proceeded in the execution thereof, made a report thereon; which was read and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of John Hall, late a major of marines," was read twice, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to 'An act to prohibit the introduction of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the 1st day of January, in the year of our Lord 1808,' and to repeal certain parts of the same," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to provide for the publication of the laws of the United States, and for other purposes," were read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the message from the Senate, announcing their disagreement to the amendment proposed by this House to the bill, entitled "An act to make valid certain acts of the justices of the peace in the District of Columbia;" whereupon the House resolved that it insist on their said amendment, and ask a conference with the Senate upon the subject matter thereof, and that managers be appointed to attend the said conference on the part of this House; and Messrs. PINDALL, HERBERT, and TRIMBLE, were appointed the said managers.

The report of the Secretary of State, upon the petition of Jonathan Elliot, together with the said petition, was referred to a select committee, and Messrs. BURWELL, JOHNSON, of Kentucky, and SIMKINS, were appointed the said committee.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of John Dillon; An act for

SHIP ARIADNE.

An engrossed bill for the relief of the owners of the ship Ariadne and her cargo was read the third time. And on the question, Shall it pass? it was determined in the negative—yeas 52, nays 82, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. So the bill was rejected.

NAVIGATION BILL.

The House then went into the consideration of the bill from the Senate, "concerning navigation," which was yesterday reported to the House by the Committee of the Whole, without amendment.

The bill being now put on its passage to a third reading, Mr. PITKIN rose, and spoke more than an hour in its support.

The question on ordering the bill to a third reading was then taken and decided in the affirmative—yeas 123, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of Vermont, Baldwin, Barbour of Virginia, Barber of Ohio, Bassett, Bateman, Bennett, Bloomfield, Boden, Butler, Campbell, Clagett, Colston, Comstock, Crafts, Crawford, Cruger, Culbreth, Cushman, Darlington, Desha, Drake, Earle, Edwards, Floyd, Folger, Forney, Forsyth, Gage, Hale, Hall of Delaware, Hasbrouck, Hiester, Hitchcock, Hogg, Holmes of Connecticut, Hopkinson, Hubbard, Hunter, Huntington, Ingham, Irving of New York, Johnson of Kentucky, NAVS—Messrs. Adams, Austin, Ellicott, Ervin of South Carolina, Garnett, Hall of North Carolina, Harrison, Hendricks, Herrick, Holmes of Massachusetts, Johnson of Virginia, Mercer, Peter, Rice, Stewart of North Carolina, and Wilson of Massachusetts.

The bill being thus ordered to a third reading, was forthwith read a third time, and passed.

MONDAY, April 13.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which were referred the bills from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the president and directors of the Merchants' Bank of Newport, in Rhode Island," and "An act for the relief of Louis and Antoine Duquindue," reported the same without amendment, and they were committed to a Committee of the Whole tomorrow.

Mr. HUGH NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which were referred the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to provide for the publication of the laws of the United States, and for other purposes," made a report; whereupon it was resolved that they concur in all the said amendments, except the two latter, to which they disagree.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to suspend, for a limited time, the sale or forfeiture of lands for failure in completing the payment thereon," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. HUGH NELSON, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to an act to prohibit the introduction of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord 1808, and to repeal certain parts of the same," reported the said bill with two amendments; which were read and concurred in by the House, and the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole, to which are committed the bill supplementary to an act regulating duties on imports and tonnage, passed the 27th of April, 1816; the bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imposts and tonnage, passed the 2d day of March, 1799;" and the bill providing for the deposit of wines and distilled spirits in public warehouses, be discharged, and that the first mentioned bill be postponed indefinitely, and that the two latter lie on the table.

The bill for the relief of James Mackey was taken up and ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. BASSETT made an unsuccessful motion to take up the report of the Committee on Pensions, unfavorable to the petition of Richard G. Morris.

The bill for the relief of Isaac Briggs passed through the Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to a third reading.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill of this House, entitled "An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the act therein mentioned," with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House. They have agreed to the conference asked by this House, upon the subject-matter of the disagreeing vote of the two Houses, on the amendment depending to the bill, entitled "An act to make valid certain acts of the justices of the peace of the District of Columbia."

The House went into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of John B. Dabney. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill for the relief of Thomas Carr, was considered in Committee of the Whole, and the House, having refused the Committee leave to sit again on the bill, laid it on the table.

The bill in addition to an act giving pensions to the widows and orphans of persons slain in the public and private armed vessels of the United States, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed.

This Committee was, on motion, discharged from the consideration of the petitions of Mrs. Lawrence and Mrs. Arundel, and the petitions laid on the table.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill repealing so much of an act as allows pay and emoluments to brevet rank, and on the bill from the Senate "regulating the pay and emoluments of brevet rank."

The Committee rose and reported the bills without amendment; when the bill last mentioned, from the Senate, was ordered to a third reading, and the former, the bill of this House, postponed indefinitely.

The House next resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to increase the duties on imported iron in bars and bolts, iron in pigs, castings, nails, and alum, and to disallow the drawback of duties on the re-exportation of gunpowder.

The discussion of the object of this bill, and of the details, consumed more than two hours; in which Messrs. CLAY, KINSEY, SMITH of North Carolina, SMITH of Maryland, MORTON, and SERGEANT, were the most active.

The Committee rose without taking any question, and obtained leave to sit again.

Mr. SLOCUM, from the managers on the part of this House, on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, on the amendments of this House to the bill directing the mode of appointing Indian agents, &c., made a report, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

LAND CLAIMS, &amp;c.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill "supplementary to the several acts for the adjustment of land claims in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri." [The general object of the bill is to authorize Boards of Commissioners to adjust all land claims of certain classes, in Louisiana and Missouri, but in fourteen long sections embraces a variety of details, confirming and adjusting certain other land claims under French and Spanish grants.]

Mr. LOWNDES, not from any hostility to the bill, or its objects, which he did not go into the consideration of, but from a belief that it was impossible, at this late period of the session, to bestow the proper attention on the multifarious provisions of the bill, or act on them with a deliberation necessary to act safely, moved that the Committee rise and report the bill, that it might be laid by for the present session.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, and Mr. POINDEXTER, severally opposed the motion, and urged the propriety of acting on the bill during the present session, as the object was one of great interest to many of the inhabitants of Louisiana and Missouri.

Without taking a question on Mr. LOWNDES's motion, which was withdrawn, the Committee passed by this bill; and

The Committee then took up, in succession, the bill for adjusting the claims to land and establishing land offices in the district east of the island of Orleans; the bill for the relief of Jonathan D. Essary and John Seybold; and the bill from the Senate for the relief of Michael Jones. The Committee then rose, and reported these bills to the House.

The two bills first named, were then, after some opposition from Mr. ROBERTSON and Mr. POINDEXTER, laid on the table, and the two bills last named, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

And then the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 14.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Edwin Lewis, soliciting the House to take into consideration the charges preferred by him at the last session, against Harry Toulmin, a Judge in the late Territory of Mississippi, and at present a Judge in the Territory of Alabama, and stating that he is prepared to substantiate the said charges.—Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. H. NELSON, presented a memorial of the clerks employed in the Executive offices of the Government at Washington, praying for an increase of compensation.—Referred

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Samuel H. Harper, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill for changing the compensation of the registers and receivers of land offices.

Mr. INGHAM, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill to increase the compensation of deputy postmasters in certain cases; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. SEYBERT, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, reported a bill making the port of Bath, in Massachusetts, a port of entry for ships or vessels arriving from the Cape of Good Hope, and from other places beyond the same; and for establishing a collection district, whereof Belfast shall be the port of entry; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. H. NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, who were instructed to inquire what fees have been charged and received by the district attorney of the southern district of the State of New York, in prosecutions brought by him against retailers of spirits, for vending them without license; and also, what fees have been received, and charged by the other officers of the United States, in the said southern district of the State of New York; and who were further instructed to prepare and report a bill of fees for the officers of the United States, in the courts of the United States, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to suspend, for a limited time, the sale or forfeiture of lands for failure in completing the payment thereon," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported amendments to be proposed to the bill supplementary to the several acts relative to direct taxes and internal duties; which were read and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, the Committee of the Whole were discharged from the further consideration of the report of the select committee appointed to inquire into the expenses incurred under the 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th articles of the Treaty of Ghent, and the same were referred to a select committee; and, Mr. TAYLOR, Mr. WILLIAMS of Connecticut, Mr. CLAIBORNE, Mr. RICH, Mr. MORTON, Mr. SHERWOOD, and Mr. BALLARD SMITH, were appointed the said committee.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, laid before the House an act of the Parliament of Great Britain, entitled "An act to allow British plantation sugar and coffee imported into Bermuda in British ships, to be exported to the territories of the United States of America in foreign ships or vessels, and to permit articles the production of the said United States, to be imported into the said island in foreign ships or vessels," passed on the 1st of July, 1812; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed for the use of the members of Congress.

Bills of the Senate, of the following titles, to wit: An act relating to the pay and emoluments of brevet officers; An act, in addition to an act, giving pensions to widows and orphans of persons slain in the public or private armed vessels of the United States; and, An act for the relief of Michael Jones; were severally read the third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Isaac Briggs," was read a third time, and passed as amended.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of James Mackay, of the Missouri Territory; An act for the relief of John B. Dabney; and, An act for the relief of Jonathan D. Essary and John Seybold, were severally read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MERCER,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to lay before this House, a statement of the number and respective dates of the contracts made for the completion of the Cumberland road, exhibiting therein, the names of, the several contractors, the extent of the road provided for by each contract, and the cost thereof per lineal, and of all the mason work per solid perch; that the said statement furnish, where practicable, the cost of the several bridges erected upon the said road; that it also present the total cost of the said road, the extent thereof already completed or contracted for; and of the part thereof for which no contract has been made, with the probable expense of completing the same; that there be subjoined to the said statement a report of the greatest elevation of any part of the said road, the average breadth thereof, and of the bed of stone or gravel laid thereupon, with the depth of the materials at the sides and in the centre of such bed; also, what provision, if any, has hitherto been made for keeping the whole, or any part, of the said road in repair; and the past expense, if any, attending such repairs.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have considered the report of the conferees on the disagreeing vote of the two Houses on the amendment of this House to the bill, entitled "An act directing the manner of appointing Indian agents, and continuing the act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes; and have disagreed to the first, and agreed to the second recommendation of the conferees. The Senate have passed the bill of this House, entitled "An act to enable the people of the Illinois Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," with amendments; and they have passed a bill, entitled "An act, in addition to an act, to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States;" in which amendments and bill they ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act, in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned," were read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the bill providing for the deposit of wines and distilled spirits in public warehouses; and the same being amended, was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

Ordered, That the report of the Committee of Claims, made on the 11th of March last, upon the subject of an extension of the provisions of the act of the 9th of April, 1816, making payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed, in the late war, be recommitted to the Committee of Claims.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act, in addition to an act, to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," was read the first time; and the question being taken, Shall it now now be read a second time? it was determined in the negative.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to enable the people of the Illinois Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," were read, and referred to a select committee; and Messrs. POPE, HENDRICKS, ROBERTSON of Kentucky, JONES, and NESBITT, were appointed the said committee.

The House took up the report of the conferees on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill directing the mode of appointing Indian agents, &c.; and,

On motion of Mr. SLOCUMB, the House resolved to recede from their amendment to said bill, to which the Senate have disagreed, and agree to the amendment contained in the second recommendation of the conferees.

COLLECTION OF THE REVENUE.

The House then, on motion of Mr. LOWNDES, took up for consideration the bill supplementary to the act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, passed 2d March, 1799.

The bill contains twenty-seven sections, embracing numerous provisions to insure the more rigid collection of the duties on imports, and to prevent frauds and evasions thereof. In going through and considering the various details of this bill, and discussing motions to amend them, the House employed sometime. Messrs. LOWNDES, SILSBEE of Rhode Island, J. NELSON, WENDOVER, SAMPSON, and PALMER, were the gentlemen who took part in maturing the bill.

The most material amendment proposed, was one offered by Mr. SILSBEE, to add a new section, providing "that masters, or other persons having charge of vessels which may arrive from a foreign port, within any district, on their way to another district of the United States, shall not be required to make entry of the vessel, or pay hospital money or tonnage duty, in the district where she may first arrive, nor to proceed from the place at which the vessel may first arrive, to any other place within said district, for the purpose of making a report."

This motion was, after some debate, negatived without a division; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

ADDITIONAL DUTIES.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to increase the duties on iron in bars and bolts, iron in pigs, castings, nails, and alum, and to disallow the drawback on gunpowder; the motion to strike out the first section, being under consideration—

Mr. SERGEANT spoke at much length in support of this bill, and of the expediency of extending additional protection to the manufactures interested in the bill.

Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, rose, he said for the purpose of moving to strike out the first section of this bill; and I hope, said he, the motion will not be thought unfair, when I state, that I am opposed not only to the proposition to increase the duty on iron, but to the bill in toto. On the subject of the discriminating duty proposed to be laid on bar iron, made by rolling, I beg leave to differ in opinion with my friend from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWNDES.) He doubts the propriety of imposing such a duty; he supposes that the manufacturer is always the purchaser, and that he should be a competent judge. Experience has taught me, that that is not the fact. The importing merchant brings the article into market for the purpose of profit; he cares nothing about the goodness of the article, if it yield him his usual per centage. The farmers, the great consumers of this article, exchange their produce for it with the merchant; they are not sufficiently skilled in this traffic to detect the imposition themselves. And so cunning are the makers of it, that, since a discriminating duty has been imposed on this rolled iron, they have run it under the hammer, to evade the duty and to cover the deception more completely; it is not until it is carried to the blacksmith, or the manufacturer, that the real quality of this iron is discovered. I concur in the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SEYBERT) that this iron is little more than pot-metal in bars, and that it is, in fact, good for nothing. My own impression is, that if such materials are permitted to come into our market lower than genuine bar iron, that our mechanics will purchase it, and permit it to enter into our domestic manufactories; and, if they do, it will undoubtedly bring our manufactories into disrepute. Again, if it is permitted to enter into our ship building, it will be productive of a great evil. I will not oppose the discriminating duty now in existence; but, to return to the main question, I have said that I am opposed to increasing the duty on bar iron. It is true, that the iron masters in New Jersey and Pennsylvania have made a great noise on this subject; but the difficulty under which they labor is altogether temporary. During the late restrictive system and the war, there was a great accumulation of iron in the Russian and Swedish markets; whilst, at the same time, and from the same cause, the article became scarce and dear in the United States. At the termination of the late war, this, as all other articles made its way, in great quantities, into our market. The importation was much greater than the demand; hence, it could only be sold at a sacrifice by the importer. The merchant was obliged to sell.

I have been informed, from a quarter on which I think I can rely, that bar iron, of good quality, during the year 1816, sold, in Philadelphia and New York, at from sixty-four to sixty-eight dollars a ton, which cost the importing merchant from eighty-five to ninety dollars. This state of things cannot last. The merchant will not import, unless he has some prospect of selling at a profit. But, sir, I have authentic evidence before me, that iron has raised, since the peace in Europe, twenty per cent. in Russia and Sweden. Good iron cannot be imported, under the existing duty of nine dollars per ton, for less than one hundred and ten dollars per ton. I have also information before me that, in New Jersey, where the greatest complaint is, that a ton of bar iron can be made from their bloomeries, at eighty-five dollars per ton—a difference of thirty dollars in the ton. If this is true, the case is not as it is represented by the ex parte evidence before us. And where do these complaints come from? They come from the vicinity of the cities of Philadelphia and New York, two great commercial towns. Iron made here, comes in direct competition with that imported, and that which has been sacrificed under the hammer, as I have stated. There wood is scarce, and of much value; there labor is very high also; and provisions higher than in any part of this country. These works grew up, many of them during the late war, and during the restrictive system that preceded it. In such situations, it could not be expected that works of that kind could flourish at any other time. They had no pledge from this Legislature, that duties should be laid and continued for their support; nor are we bound to sacrifice the great interests of this country to prop such fungus establishments. They like other speculators, expected to profit by the necessities of their neighbors; let them, then, stand on their own bottom. If this basis is not sufficient, let them go down.

Some of this iron is of superior quality; it sells in the market at from ten to fifteen dollars less per ton, than Russian or Swedish iron; whilst, at the same time, at Baltimore and other places, the iron, made in that quarter, sells at from five to ten dollars preference per ton. Their bloomed iron is too much like the English rolled iron. It is a question whether we should encourage the production of this iron in the United States. It is important that your iron should be of the best quality. Your cannon, and all your implements of war, should be made, of the very best materials. Your ship builders require iron of the best quality likewise. The truth of this can be evidenced by the statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. SILSBEE,) who stated to you, that vessels had been lately lost from the brittleness of the iron used in their making. But, again sir, this iron enters into your domestic manufactures also; and, in my opinion, it is not the interest of this country to encourage the production of inferior iron; for, if it is brought into your market, the mechanics will purchase it, and it will enter into your domestic manufactures. They will be inferior in quality; which will be calculated to injure their character in your own market; this will encourage the exportation of the articles from England, our great rival in iron manufactures. But, sir, the alarm is sounded—you are told, that, if these works go down, the business of making iron is lost to your country forever; and that, if war should again come, you are ruined. This I deny, and against such doctrine, permit me now to enter my protest. At this time, the works in the interior of your country ask of you no protection; there are only about fifty petitions on your table; they bear but a small proportion to the number that are in the United States. All the works are doing well at this time. Where they are well situated for the business, their owners are making large fortunes. In the part of the country from which I come, the domestic iron has a preference to the best Russian and Swedish iron, for most purposes, and it sells lower by one or two cents in the pound, whilst both pay the same carriage. And, sir, at this time, there are seven new States in this Union, and two great Territories, that have yet to get their iron from the North and interior, or from foreign nations; all these States and Territories have iron ore of the best quality, and in the greatest abundance. So pure is this ore, that, I am informed, it can be wrought into spikes and horse-shoes from the ore bank. Wood is inexhaustible; pit coal abounds in great quantities; provisions are cheaper there than in any part of the world, and the price of labor is lower than in the North. Where slaves can be employed, their labor is always cheaper than that of white men. The seasons in the South differ from the North; in the former you can labor all the season, in the latter you cannot.

Now, I would ask, if these people are going to suffer for iron? No, sir, very soon they will supply themselves. Yes, sir, and the North can be supplied from that quarter, should they need it. And should a market present itself to them, they will be able to supply the whole globe. Those who are not conversant with the history of that country may say, that, it being in the interior, the carriage will prevent its coming into market. Should such an opinion exist, it is a mistaken one. They have the finest rivers in the world, intersecting the country in every direction. And, since the power to propel boats, by steam, has been invented, they have every facility for their commerce. If all this be true, can we not supply ourselves in war, as well as in peace, with this necessary article—nay, I would say, this indispensable article?

Additional Duties.

We achieved our independence with less facilities than we have at this time, all will admit; and, in a recent war, we succeeded equally well. Why, then, do they appeal to our fears?

But, sir, I have another objection to this proposed increase of duty on bar iron: it is taxing the raw material of our extensive domestic manufactures. At this time, we make all kinds of tools, for the various mechanics in this country, at home; also, all the implements of our agriculture are made in this country. In fact, there is no species of manufactures in the United States that are so extensive, or so useful, as that just mentioned. The duty proposed to be laid on bar iron, by the bill now before the Committee, is twenty-five per cent. ad valorem; and the duties on foreign articles, imported into the United States, of which iron is the chief article of value, is only charged with a duty of twenty per cent. ad valorem. Is this the way that domestic manufactures are to be encouraged? This is certainly new doctrine. Alexander Hamilton, who was the great advocate for manufactures at home, always enforced the idea, that the raw materials should come into this country clear of duty. In his able report to the House of Representatives, in 1790, on the subject of domestic manufactures, he tells you, in very direct terms, that this very article of bar iron should come into your country free of duties. His opinion was, that, by encouraging the manufacture of the article you would increase the demand, and thereby its production at home; and that the iron works would be benefited. He advanced the same doctrine as respects copper, tin, zinc, old pewter, &c. These are, most of them, free in your present tariff. But, sir, the wiseacres of the day, the new political economists of the North, have found out that Mr. Hamilton was wrong, and that Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations has been a curse to this country. But, sir, do not they advance the same doctrine when they say, encourage and protect our cotton factories to the North; this is the way to encourage the production of the raw material in the South? Why, then, is not Mr. Hamilton's doctrine, as regards iron, true likewise? The highest tax or duty that ever was imposed on bar iron before the war was fifteen per cent. ad valorem, two and a half of this was the Mediterranean fund duty, which was never considered a permanent duty. But, sir, your petitioners must have thirteen and five-sixths per cent. more than was ever laid before. And they appeal to your patriotism—they tell you that you should protect every branch of industry in your country. And, sir, so you should; but you should never sacrifice the interest of the many to the cupidity and mercenary views of the few. But, sir, here—here is the objection: the great agricultural interest must bend before these mercenary few—these fat capitalists. Agriculture must pay the premium; she must be taxed; and the farmer, the most remote from trade, must be taxed most. Yes, sir, the man who has the fewest natural advantages, must be taxed most—he is the greatest consumer of iron. To get the surplus product of his honest labor to the market, he must have wagons, carts, horses, &c. These require much iron to keep them in repair. But, sir, what has been the course of these iron masters? When they found that war had excluded foreign iron from our market, did they say to the farmer: Come, now that war exists, you cannot get iron from foreign markets—you must have it—but we sympathize with your misfortunes—you are hard pressed—your produce will bring nothing—come, we can make it as cheap as ever—labor is cheaper—provisions are cheaper, and the demand is greater—you shall have it at the old price. Was this their language? No, sir—no. Say they, come now; we have the advantage; the farmer must have it; he is obliged to buy from us; come, let us make our fortunes. Iron rose from 50 to 75 per cent. cash; no credit now; at the same time the farmer's tobacco was rotting in his barn; it would not bring three dollars per hundred; his wheat spoiling in his garners; flour would not bring four dollars a barrel; his land, his house, his everything, taxed to support the cause of his country, at the same time. Did the capitalist sympathize for the farmer? No, sir; the iron master's patriotism, his sympathy, was suspended; nor never would he have thought of it again, but for his own dear self, who thought it a good pretext to get the advantage of the farmer a little once more. Sir, I look upon agriculture as the first, and the greatest interest of this country; and while I am honored with a seat on this floor, I will always raise my voice in its support, and against these monopolizing principles. If this bill is adopted, it will impose a considerable tax on your agriculture. But, poor old Agriculture? She is, I am fearful, doomed soon to be the pack-horse of manufactures and of commerce. They are always seeking to get some advantage by getting monopolies. Honest old Agriculture has no such feeling; she knows no such principles. All that she asks of you is to keep your hands off her; she is strong; she is athletic; let her alone and she can, she will protect herself. When the clarion of war is sounded, who is the most able and the most willing to take the field to defend your nation's rights? It is the farmer. Is his soil invaded? If it is, he will offer his life in the defence of it. He is stout and strong; his whole life, from infancy to manhood, is as a campaign. When he is called to the field, it is nothing new to him to be exposed. Now contrast the case of the manufacturer; any place is his country where his profits are the greatest. Is he to take the field to defend his country, he is weak; he has been raised in a store-room, under a covert; he is unable to stand against the cold, chilling blasts of the north, rain and snow. Nor is he even able to stand the scorching rays of a meridian sun. These facts have been but too fatally demonstrated.

But, sir, it is said your country cannot prosper unless you encourage manufactures. How is this? Has any country ever equalled this in the same time? It has been agricultural solely, or nearly so. In less than fifty years this Republic has become a great nation; second in commerce; second in a naval power; most brave in the field; most skilful and most victorious on the water; rich—independent.

APRIL, 1818.

But, sir, I hope I shall not be viewed as an enemy to domestic manufactures. They are growing up in our country, and, as we progress towards a more perfect state of internal improvement and agriculture, they will increase. When the population becomes dense, when emigration shall cease in a great degree, when the fine lands of the West and South shall be disposed of, then will manufactures begin to raise their heads. I think it not the true policy nor the true economy of this country to force this state of things by bounties and by protecting duties. When you raise your duties beyond the point necessary for raising the revenue necessary for the support of your Government, you encourage smuggling. Your customs are defrauded; your regular merchants are unable to sell their goods; fraud and speculation is the result. The effect that this will have on the morals of your country, is too apparent to require comment. And if you commence this system, all classes will have an equal right to your protection. Yes, sir, the tailors have petitioned you this session for protection; they want you to lay heavy duties on clothes imported ready made. Who is it that will believe that they want protection, after paying them from eight to ten dollars for making a coat?

I have gone through the observations I had intended to submit to the Committee. I hope they will see with me the evil tendency of this bill, and will consent to strike out the first section.

Mr. SIMKINS, of South Carolina, said: Mr. Chairman, at this protracted stage of the debate, when the Committee is so much exhausted in patience, and pressed for time, it is with unfeigned diffidence that I beg its attention for a few moments. Indeed, I should not have risen at all, but that I conceive some points, in this important subject, have been altogether omitted, or but slightly touched, which I deem material to its illustration.

At the commencement of the last war, the manufactures of the most indispensable articles in the United States, were, for the most part, in their infancy, and entirely inadequate to the supply of our wants. These wants became the more pressing, because the importation of them had been previously interdicted by the embargo laws, and could be had but in scanty supplies, and at very high prices during the war. Thus it was, that, when our necessities became greatest, our supplies were most inadequate to our rising wants. The consequence of this state of things was, that manufacturing establishments sprung up to our relief, in various parts of the continent, and we were supplied with cannon, arms, and other munitions of war, and our armies, to a considerable extent, were clothed from our own establishments. I mention these facts, Mr. Chairman, to show, which they most unequivocally do, that he who is a friend to his country's true independence must be a friend to manufactures, to a reasonable and practicable extent. When the war ceased, it was the true policy of Great Britain, who had viewed our rising establishments with great pain and jealousy, to throw into our market such a quantity of goods, of every sort, at low prices, as to sink to destruction these establishments, and, with them, the fortunes and hopes of those patriotic and public spirited men who had invested their capital in them. This effect was in such a rapid state of progression that it awakened an enlightened American Congress to the consideration of the subject. To give some protection to those establishments which had greatly helped to save us in time of war, and without which no nation on earth can ever be truly independent or safe, as well as to raise a revenue, the Congress of 1816 passed a law, imposing a tariff, or system of duties, on the most of those foreign articles which could be made among ourselves, and the extravagant importations of which were about to bring ruin on our manufactures! This was wise, it was patriotic, it was in fact the duty of the Representatives of the nation. These protecting duties, light as they were, in most instances, had, in some good degree, the desired effect; but the manufacturer of iron met the hardest fate, because it is a fact, as was stated by the Speaker, in this debate, and controverted by no one, that the duty on foreign iron imported was not in the same proportion with that on other articles. This omission was a strange one, Mr. Chairman, and the more so, because iron must be conceded to be an article of the very first necessity, and, therefore, ought to have been, in the same proportion, encouraged. That this article had less of the fostering care of the Government than almost any other, is demonstrated by the present state and situation of those manufactories throughout the continent—for all accounts agree that those which have not already sunk, are in a progressive state of dilapidation. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, no man could fail to feel an interest, on hearing the eloquent, yet distressing picture, yesterday presented by the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. KIMSEY.) He tells you that, eighty or one hundred of these establishments are falling to ruin in New Jersey alone. Is not iron, then, (enough of the ore of which lies in our hills to supply the world,) an indispensable article; and will you not encourage its production in our own country? Let us anticipate the march of time, and conceive ourselves on the verge of another war, when the article will be wanting for cannon, for small arms, and for almost every useful agricultural instrument. Will you fold your arms, and suffer your manufactories to sink, until the time of war, which shall cut off your foreign supplies, shall arrive? Will you act the part of wisdom, and prepare for the day of necessity, or will you, like the spendthrift, leave every day to provide for itself? Are we not able to make our own iron in sufficient quantities, and cheap enough to be within the reach of every man in the nation who wants to use it, or must we still be dependent on foreign importations? Mr. Chairman, I am sick of these unceasing, unnecessary, foreign predilections; and I wish to make our own country what it might be, and what it must be, before it is really great, independent of Europe. We are not satisfied with importing foreign notions and prejudices, and errors, but we must work foreign iron, almost exclusively, when we can have, cheap enough, abundant supplies at home. Is there nothing due to those who risked their capital to sustain the nation in the day of need?

APRIL, 1818.

Additional Duties.

But, Mr. Chairman, what is to be the consequence of letting our own iron works sink by foreign importations? The obvious consequence is, as was just now demonstrated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) that when your own manufacturers are ruined, and their establishments destroyed, foreign iron will immediately take a rise. Yes, foreigners will then get their own prices, for there will be no competition to check them. I beg gentlemen to remember this when about to give their votes.

Do the manufacturers ask any unreasonable or ruinous protection? By no means. If they did, I should not stand here to sanction their pretensions. They scarcely ask an increase of half a cent a pound. So far from wishing you to exclude the importation of iron, they only ask to be put upon grounds of fair competition. Will an American Congress thus refuse to American citizens such a request? I trust not.

If, Mr. Chairman, we are disposed to learn lessons of wisdom upon this subject, let us have recourse to England; a nation of whom, whatever else may be said, this may well be pronounced, that she has arrived, in commerce and manufactures, to unrivalled prosperity and greatness. Let us, then, discard her examples, which are destructive, but embrace her wisdom and experience, which are true and sound.

How, let it be asked, has that nation become unrivalled in manufactories? By a constant, unwearied attention to this subject; by protecting, by laws, and every means in her power, every establishment of importance to the country.—With what alarm would this calculating, experienced, and politic nation, see the approaching ruin of any material manufactory. Her statesmen would startle at such a prospect, and rush forward with avidity and save it.

There is, Mr. Chairman, another view of this subject, not fully presented, which ought to arrest the attention of the American statesman. It is the true policy of every state or country to encourage and buy of its own citizens, every essential article which can be had, without too great a sacrifice, because, thereby you add to its riches by keeping the money among ourselves. This has been England's true and unvarying policy. She well knows that capital laid out abroad for foreign productions, which can be as well produced at home, is forever lost, both principal and interest. This consideration seems to me to be so obvious that I forbear to dwell upon it.

But the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. SMITH) has, without any bad motive, I grant, endeavored to array the agriculturist against the manufacturer, and to excite an idea of different feelings and interests in a great community, which ought to harmonize, and which is really identified, both by principle and interest. He asks, will you tax the agriculturist for the manufacturer, without giving him any adequate advantage? Mr. Chairman, this is not the fact—the gentleman would "call by different names brethren of the same family." Is not agriculture "that first and best employment of man," in which I myself am interested, and to which I know I am as great a friend as the gentleman from North Carolina, or any gentleman on this floor; I say, is not agriculture most of all interested in the production of iron? Can the farmer proceed a step without the implements of husbandry? But, says the gentleman, we may get it cheaper from abroad; perhaps it may be a little cheaper at this particular period, and why? Because it is England's interest, and it is the interest of all Europe to glut your markets, and they have glutted them, for the special purpose of destroying your manufactories! This is what they aim at—what they seek above all things. When this is done, take my word for it, iron will rise in price—foreigners, having prostrated your infant manufactories, will ask for their iron just what prices they please, and when we are pressed by another war, or by any other great national emergency, the nations of Europe "will laugh you to scorn, and mock when your fear cometh." Yes, Mr. Chairman, when pressed by war or embargo; when necessity knocks loudly at every man's door, then you see those establishments destroyed which would succor and save you! Then you must wait, in painful suspense, the tedious re-establishment of new manufactories, and the learning new workmen, or behold your country, for the want of them, on the brink of ruin.

Perhaps you may, at this moment, get iron a trifle cheaper from foreign places, but you cannot get it cheaper permanently; you cannot get it cheaper in the end! It is then to protect our own citizens by a small additional duty, to a certain extent, that I contend—a duty that may yield them great assistance, and do us no harm. Do us no harm, did I say? Would advance our true and solid interests.

From the best information which can be procured, it appears that the quantity of iron consumed in the United States is 45,000 tons.

In 1810, the quantity manufactured in the United States was 30,000 tons.

In 1814, 40,000 tons.

Leaving a surplus for common use of only about 5,000 tons.

In 1817, such was the shock received by the peace, and the consequent glut by foreign importations, that only about 15,000 tons were manufactured. By the protecting duties of 1816, which were not equal on iron to other articles imported, a few of the manufactories only have been enabled to survive, and whether they can still live will depend on the passage of this bill.

Great Britain, about twenty years back, manufactured only 18,000 tons; but by the uncommon encouragement with which the manufacturers met, and the great improvements by them made, in the year 1816 she manufactured 200,000 tons.

Now the fair inference is, that by seizing those great improvements in our power, by the superiority of our ore, both as to quantity and quality, our unbounded resources in coal as well as wood, in which we have a most unquestionable superiority over Great Britain, we may shortly make not only an abundant supply for ourselves, but draw vast riches into our country by the exportation of the article. It is supposed by good judges that we might make enough to supply the world!

Mr. Chairman, our Federal Constitution, the foundation and ligament of our political existence, is the offspring of compromise and mutual concession and affection. Shall then the planters of the Middle and Southern States, who are amassing fortunes by the production of rice, cotton, tobacco, and flour, refuse to yield some small and fraternizing token of respect and encouragement to the manufacturers of the Eastern and Middle States, in the time of their greatest need? From the discussion of this question, by some gentlemen, it would really seem that one class of the community was seeking something which would ruin some other. Nothing so erroneous; I am the friend of agriculture on this occasion; not only the agriculturist, but the whole civilized world is interested in the production of iron; the manufacturers themselves are agriculturists; their neighbors and friends are agriculturists; the whole country around them, and upon whose supplies they depend, is agricultural; the interests of both classes are united and indissoluble. The agricultural part of the community are already, and must ever be, the most independent; and will those who are most independent refuse encouragement to those establishments which will render them still more so? Away then with the jaundiced view of a difference of interest; it can answer no other purpose than to create sectional injurious jealousies, such as would go to destroy our happy Union!

I would go as far to represent my constituents in any local matter, which required attention, as any other man; I never could and never would desert them. But as, on another occasion, I endeavored so to convince the House, I stop here. After serving our constituents faithfully in those particular interests, where others from different sections could not, in the nature of things, so well do it, we become the representatives of the whole nation, and he who best consults the general interest, and whose measures are best calculated to give plenty, content, and union to all, deserves the most applause from his country.

The motion to strike out the first section, was negatived; and

The Committee having gone through this bill, took up the bill to increase the duties on certain manufactured articles, (shot, paper, &c.,) imported into the United States, and to change the duty from an ad valorem to a specific one.

A motion, by Mr. COLARON, to strike out the first section, was lost.

Some other amendments were made to both the bills, and some proposed that were rejected, which gave rise to much debate.

Among the motions which prevailed, was one by Mr. PITKIN, to strike out the proposed modification of the duty on paper.

The bills having been reported to the House, the amendments made were generally agreed to without a division.

Mr. LITTLE made an attempt to retain the clause for modifying the duty on paper, which failed, by a considerable majority.

Mr. BUTLER renewed the motion, which had been previously made in Committee of the Whole, by Mr. MORTON, to strike out "one dollar," the duty proposed hereafter to be levied on "iron in bars and bolts manufactured without rolling." This motion was negatived—yeas 50, nays 82, as follows:

After rejecting several motions to adjourn, the two bills were finally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

[As ordered to the third reading, the contents of these bills vary from the statements heretofore given of them, by the omission of the proposed duty on paper, and by the additional duty of the following: On spikes three cents per pound; on anchors two cents per pound; on cut glass thirty per cent. ad valorem; on brown Russia sheeting, not exceeding fifty-two archines in each piece, $1 60 per piece; on white do. do., $2 60 per piece. The two acts to take effect from the 30th June next.]

Mr. T. M. NELSON moved that, for the remainder of the session, the House do meet at ten instead of eleven o'clock.—Negatived.

And the House adjourned at half-past six o'clock.

WEDNESDAY, April 13.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate disagree to the amendment proposed by this House to their bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Isaac Briggs;" and they have receded from their seventh amendment to the bill of this House, entitled "An act to provide for the publication of the Laws of the United States, and for other purposes;" and they insist on their 8th amendment to the said bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of John Hall, late a Major of marines;" reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Richard M. Johnson."

Mr. WILLIAMS also reported a bill for transferring the claims in the office of the Commissioner of the Third Auditor of the Treasury Department; which was read twice, and also committed to the Committee of the Whole last mentioned.

Mr. PINDALL, from the committee of conference between the two Houses, on the disagreeing votes respecting the amendments of this House to the bill to make valid certain acts of the justices of the peace of the District of Columbia, reported it as the unanimous opinion of the committees of both Houses that the bill was unnecessary, the acts therein referred to being valid without the interposition of the Legislature; and the whole subject was, therefore, on motion of Mr. BASSETT, indefinitely postponed.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the memorial of Manuel Torres, who offers to the United States a financial discovery which he considers of great value, reported that his suggestions were, from the respectable personal character of the memorialist, entitled to an examination; but that the remainder of this session, if the whole time of the committee were devoted to it, was not sufficient for the due investigation of the subject, and therefore recommending that it be postponed to the next session.—Concurred in.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the Committee of Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the amendments of the Senate to the bill, in addition to the several acts for enforcing the neutral relations of the United States, reported the opinion of the committee, that the said amendments, one excepted, be concurred in. But, after some conversation, the bill was laid on the table, on the suggestion of Mr. TUCKER that the amendments were important; and desiring himself that the bill should pass in the shape in which it went from this House, he moved that it lie on the table, to give further time for the consideration of the amendments.

Mr. POPE, from the committee to whom was referred, yesterday, the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to enable the people of the Illinois Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," reported the agreement of the committee to the said amendments, and the amendments were then concurred in by the House.

The bill from the Senate to amend the charter of the Bank of the United States, so as to authorize the appointment of a vice president and deputy cashier, &c., was read a second time. On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury in favor of the measure was read; when, on motion of Mr. LITTLE, who desired a more particular consideration of the subject, the bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary—61 to 55.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole, to which are committed the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act fixing the compensation of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, and of the clerks employed in their offices;" and the bill to regulate and fix the compensation of clerks in the different offices, be discharged, and that they be committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill supplementary to the several acts making appropriations for the year 1818.

Mr. SCOTT gave notice that he would, on tomorrow, move the House for leave to bring in a bill to suspend the sales of certain lands in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of this House of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of Major General Jacob Brown; An act fixing the time for the next meeting of Congress; and, An act for the relief of Thomas Miller and Stephen Baker, with amendments. They have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act concerning tonnage and discriminating duties in certain cases; An act authorizing a subscription for the Statistical Annals, by Adam Seybert, and the purchase of Pitkin's Commercial Statistics; and, An act fixing the compensation of Indian agents and factors; in which amendments and bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act to increase the compensation of deputy postmasters in certain cases; An act making the port of Bath in Massachusetts, a port of entry for ships or vessels arriving from the Cape of Good Hope, and from places beyond the same, and for establishing a collection district, whereof Belfast shall be the port of entry; An act providing for the deposit of wines and distilled spirits in public warehouses; An act to increase the duties on certain manufactured articles imported into the United States; and, An act supplementary to an act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," passed the 2d day of March, 1799—were severally read the third time, and passed.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bills of this House, entitled, An act for the relief of Major General Jacob Brown; An act fixing the time for the next meeting of Congress; and, An act for the relief of Thomas Miller and Stephen Baker, were read, and severally concurred in by the House.

The House took up, and proceeded to consider, their disagreement to the 8th amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to provide for the publication of the laws of the United States, and for other purposes;" on which amendment the Senate have insisted; and the said amendment being again read, it was resolved that the House recede from their disagreement to the said 8th amendment.

The House proceeded to reconsider their amendment to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Isaac Briggs," to which the Senate have disagreed; and the said amendment being again read, it was resolved that this House recede from the said amendment.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act fixing the compensation of Indian agents and factors," was read twice, and referred to the committee on that part of the President's Message which relates to Indian affairs.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing a subscription for the Statistical Annals, by Adam Seybert, and the purchase of Pitkin's Commercial Statistics," was read twice, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act concerning tonnage and discriminating duties, in certain cases," was read twice, and referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, which was read, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:
In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 10th instant, relative to the capture and imprisonment of certain persons, citizens of the United States, therein specifically mentioned, I now transmit a report from the Secretary of State, which, with the documents accompanying it, embrace the objects contemplated by the said resolution.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, April 15, 1818.

The said Message and documents were laid on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the annual statements of the importations of merchandise in American and foreign vessels for one year, ending on the 30th September, 1816; which was ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House another letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting sundry statements presented in obedience to "An act establishing a mint and regulating the coins of the United States;" which was ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House sundry papers, transmitted to him by the Secretary of State, being the remainder of those referred to in his report of the 14th March, accompanying the Message of the President of the United States of that date; which papers were ordered to lie on the table.

THE SLAVE TRADE.

On the earnest request of Mr. SIMKINS, who considered the bill as highly important to the Southern States particularly; seconded by Mr. HARRISON, who considered it equally important to the States not holding slaves, bordering on the slaveholding States, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill from the Senate, supplementary to the act prohibiting the importation of slaves.

Mr. SIMKINS proposed an amendment to the bill, providing for disposing of slaves seized for being illegally imported, by sale, one-half of the proceeds to the benefit of the United States, and the other to the benefit of the officers making the seizures, &c. This motion was advocated by Messrs. SIMKINS and EDWARDS, who seconded the motion, as the only means of executing the laws against the slave trade, as experience had fully demonstrated since the origin of the prohibition. Mr. H. NELSON protested against the introduction of a provision into our laws, which he declared to be inconsistent with the principles of our Government, and calculated to throw as wide open the door to the importation of slaves as it was before the existing prohibition. Further debate took place on the amendment, which was advocated by Mr. PINDALL, on the ground of the absolute necessity of such a provision, to make the laws efficient against the slave trade.

The amendment was finally rejected by a large majority; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

ADDITIONAL DUTIES.

An engrossed bill to increase the duties on iron in bars and bolts, iron in pigs, castings, nails, and alum, and to disallow the drawback of duties on the re-exportation of gunpowder, was also read the third time—And on the question, Shall the bill pass? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 88, nays 47, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen of Vermont, Anderson of Kentucky, Baldwin, Barber of Ohio, Bassett, Bateman, Beecher, Bennett, Bloomfield, Boden, Campbell, Colston, Crafts, Crawford, Cruger, Culbreth, Darlington, Desha, Drake, Earle, Ellicott, Folger, Gage, Hale, Hall of Delaware, Harrison, Hasbrouck, Hendricks, Herkimer, Herrick, Heister, Hitchcock, Holmes of Connecticut, Hopkinson, Hubbard, Hunter, Ingham, Irving of New York, Kinsey, Kirtland, Lawyer, Linn, Little, W. Ordered, That the title be, "An act to increase the duties on iron in bars and bolts, iron in pigs, castings, nails, and alum."

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to continue in force, from and after the 30th June, 1819, until the 30th June, 1826, the fourth paragraph of the first section of the act "to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage." The paragraph referred to is that which establishes the duty on the importation of foreign manufactures, of which the principal material is wool or cotton, &c.

Mr. EDWARDS moved—on the ground that there was no necessity for acting on the subject at the present time, and, being no necessity for it, there remained too little time for a proper investigation of the subject—that the first section of the bill be stricken out.

This motion gave rise to a short, but spirited debate; in the course of which, Mr. TUCKER, Mr. EDWARDS, Mr. MERCER, and Mr. RHEA, supported the motion, as well on the ground of hostility to the excessive taxation of agriculture for the benefit of the manufacturing interest, as of the want of time for a full discussion, &c. And Mr. SEYBERT, Mr. CLAY, Mr. MASON of Massachusetts, Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. KINSEY, Mr. LOWNDES, and Mr. SOUTHARD, opposed it, on both the grounds assumed.

The question having been taken on striking out the first section, it was decided in the negative—ayes 33.

The Committee then proceeded further in amending the bill; in which Mr. SILSSEE, Mr. LOWNDES, and Mr. PITKIN, took part.

Mr. MERCER proposed an amendment, the object of which was, that the duty of 25 per cent. should be imposed, not on a fixed value of 25 cents per yard, but upon an actual valuation, as in the case of other ad valorem duties.—Negatived.

Mr. COLSTON made a motion to amend the bill, the object of which was, to limit the extension of the present duties to two years, instead of seven, as provided by the bill. And this motion was decided in the negative—yeas 31, nays 108, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Austin, Barbour of Virginia, Burwell, Cobb, Colston, Edwards, Ervin of South Carolina, Forney, Hogg, Johnson of Virginia, Mercer, Miller, H. Nelson, T. M. Nelson, Peter, Pindall, Pleasants, Reed, Rhea, Schuyler, Slocumb, B. Smith, A. Smyth, J. S. Smith, Stewart of North Carolina, Stuart of Maryland, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Walker of North Carolina, Williams of North Carolina, and Wilson of Massachusetts—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adams, Allen of Vermont, Anderson of Kentucky, Baldwin, Barber of Ohio, Bassett, Bateman, Beecher, Bennett, Bloomfield, Boden, Boss, Butler, Campbell, Clagett, Cook, Crafts, Crawford, Cruger, Culbreth, Cushman, Darlington, Desha, Drake, Earle, Ellicott, Floyd, Folger, Gage, Hale, Hall of Del., Harrison, Hasbrouck, Herrick, Hitchcock, Holmes of Connecticut, Hopkinson, Hubbard, Hunter, Huntington, Ingham, Irving of New York, Jones, Kinsey, Kirtland, Lawyer, Linn, Little, Livermore, Lowndes, W. So the motion was rejected.

Mr. SMITH, of N. Carolina, moved an amendment to the bill, to this effect: that, after the 30th June next, the duty of 20 cents per bushel on salt imported should cease, and a duty of 10 cents thereon be substituted in lieu thereof.

On the suggestion of Mr. MERCER, Mr. SMITH consented to modify his motion, so as to propose 12½ cents instead of 10 cents, as the future duty on salt.

Mr. COBB advocated the motion at some length, and Mr. LOWNDES opposed it. After which, the question was taken on the motion, and decided in the negative—yeas 53, nays 92, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Anderson of Kentucky, Austin, Baldwin, Barbour of Virginia, Boden, Burwell, Butler, Clagett, Cobb, Colston, Edwards, Ervin of South Carolina, Hale, Hall of Delaware, Herbert, Herkimer, Hogg, Hopkinson, Johnson of Virginia, Livermore, McCoy, Mercer, Miller, J. The question was then taken, Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time, and passed in the affirmative—yeas 106, nays 34, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adams, Anderson of Kentucky, Baldwin, Barber of Ohio, Bassett, Bateman, Beecher, Bennett, Bloomfield, Boden, Boss, Butler, Campbell, Cagett, Comstock, Cook, Crafts, Crawford, Cruger, Culbreth, Cushman, Darlington, Desha, Drake, Earle, Elcott, Floyd, Folger, Gage, Hale, Hall of Delaware, Hasbrouck, Hendricks, Herkimer, Herrick, Hitchcock, Holmes of Connecticut, Hopkinson, Hubbard, Hunter, Huntington, Irving of New York, Kinsey, Kirtland, Lawyer, Linn, Little, Lowndes, W. Smith, Stewart of North Carolina, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Walker of North Carolina, Williams of North Carolina, and Wilson of Massachusetts—34.

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

THURSDAY, April 16.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing a subscription for the Statistical Annals, by Adam Seybert, and the purchase of Pitkin's Commercial Statistics, reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. HUGH NELSON, the Committee of Accounts were authorized and directed to make the same allowance for extra services to the persons serving this House as were granted at the end of the last session, and to Christopher Dunn, for his services, fifty dollars.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, the President of the United States was requested to obtain from the Spanish authorities all records and official documents appertaining to the government of Louisiana, particularly such as concern grants and titles to land which may have been taken out of that country at the period of its cession to the United States.—Mr. ROBERTSON and Mr. LIVING were appointed a committee to present the said resolution to the President of the United States.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, the memorial and petitions relative to land claims which have been addressed to this House from the State of Louisiana and the Territory of Missouri, were referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with a request to report to Congress, at their next session, a plan for their final adjustment and settlement.

In pursuance of the notice given yesterday, Mr. SCOTT asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to suspend the sales of certain lands in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri; and Mr. SCOTT, Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, and Mr. POINDEXTER, were appointed a committee to prepare and bring in the same, with leave to sit during the session of the House.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to an act to prohibit the introduction of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord, 1808," and to repeal certain parts of the same, was read the third time and passed as amended.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to continue in force from and after the 30th of June, 1819, until the 30th of June, 1826, the fourth paragraph of the 1st section of the act, entitled "An act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage," was read the third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the houses of Thomas and John Clifford, Elisha Fisher and Company, Thomas Clifford and Son, and Thomas Clifford, of Philadelphia, and Charles Wirgman, of Baltimore," with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. LEWIS submitted the following proposition of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which was read and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of the same concurring, That the following sections be recommended to the several States of the Union, for their adoption, as amendments to the Constitution of the United States:

II. The Senate and House of Representatives of the United States shall, by joint ballot, appoint to offices, and fill all vacancies in the judiciary of the United States.

III. The Senate and House of Representatives of the United States shall appoint, by joint ballot, the following heads of departments, whose term of service shall continue — years; but may be removed from office at any time during the term for which they were elected, for inability to discharge the duties of office, or for high crimes and misdemeanors:

DELINQUENT PAYMASTERS.

Mr. T. M. NELSON reported a bill to authorize the recovery of public money. [Providing that suit may be commenced to coerce a settlement of open accounts of persons who receive and expend the public moneys.]

This bill was twice read.

Mr. T. M. NELSON moved, that it be read a third time. Referring to a statement, yesterday laid on the tables of the House, of the names of those "paymasters of the late army of the United States" who have failed duly to account for the moneys confided to their charge, Mr. N. said, there was, it appeared, an unliquidated debt, apparently due, from persons of that description alone, to the amount of three millions of dollars. Upon conversation with the accounting officers of the Treasury, he found that they did not consider themselves authorized to bring suit against any delinquent until his accounts were liquidated, and the balance ascertained. This settlement, of course, was delayed by the defaulter; and the object of the bill was to enable the accounting officers to coerce the persons so situated to come to a settlement.

After some conversation in which Mr. LOWNDES expressed his surprise at the construction which it appeared had been given to the existing law; Mr. BURWELL congratulated the House on the introduction of this bill, so necessary to the security of public money, to the protection of honest claimants, and the detection of fraudulent transactions; and Mr. T. M. NELSON reaffirmed what he had already said, adding, that, as Government preserved a coercive power over officers while in office, instances have occurred frequently, in which officers, under the present regulations, were kept in office without performing any duty, merely to secure a settlement of their accounts.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The bill from the Senate, supplementary to the act incorporating the Bank of the United States, (authorizing the appointment of a vice president, &c.,) having been read, and the question stated on ordering the same to be read a third time—

Mr. MOORE, of Pennsylvania, rose and said, he hoped the bill would not be ordered to a third reading. He said he was opposed to the passage of this bill for several reasons: because it contained a principle novel and unprecedented in itself, authorizing the president and directors of this stupendous national institution to appoint an assistant president and cashier, for signing the bills of the bank, in order to throw more of their paper into circulation and into the market. This, of itself, was sufficient to induce him to vote against the bill on the table; inasmuch, as he did not believe that such a necessity existed as to warrant or to justify Congress to interfere in this unknown of and unprecedented way. But this, Mr. M. said, was not his strong objection to the passage of the bill—he was opposed to affording any additional facilities to this immense corporation, already too powerful as it respected the moneyed transactions of this country, further to oppress the State and local banks of this country, and, through them, the people—those of the Western country particularly. He was enabled, he said, by his personal observations, to speak with precision as to the prejudicial results and effects this bank had in its operation there, particularly in that portion of the country he had the honor, in part, to represent. Sir, said he, in consequence of the inimical disposition shown by this powerful national corporation, to the State and local banks, the paper of the latter is at a large discount, although they pay specie for their notes, and are obliged to curtail their discounts, and, in many instances, compelled to press their borrowers in order to redeem their paper, held by this bank, its branches, and the Government. This process, Mr. M. said, caused a pressure severe in the extreme, and unprecedented in its extent, in the West, so much so, that he would be unfaithful to his constituents and to himself if he did not raise his voice against the passage of this bill, which, in his opinion, was fraught with evils to the vital interest of the Western country; and he hoped there was virtue and independence enough in this House to prevent its passage, and thereby rescue, temporarily at least, a great portion of the people from sudden and inevitable ruin. Mr. M. said, he would not now examine the policy or impolicy of the establishment of this national bank, it was now too late for that discussion: he would only remark, he never was in favor of the creation of this corporation at the time it was created, with its ample powers and enormous capital.

His observations he now wished to confine to the effects and operations of this bank on the country. What, he asked, were the consequences, in the State of Ohio, of the orders given to the receivers of public moneys there by the Secretary of the Treasury? In the land office at Wooster, he was informed, no money would be taken but the paper of the Bank of the United States, specie, and paper at par in the cities. This it was out of the power of the people to procure, as the paper of all their banks was at a discount; the consequence would be, that many of our most valuable citizens will be ruined, their labor and money be lost, and their land revert to the Government, or fall into the hands of moneyed speculators. All this embarrassment was attributed, he said, by the best informed, to the operations of this stupendous bank. This very morning had this House passed a bill preventing the forfeiture of lands in Ohio, for the non-payment of the moneys due according to the terms of sale, until the 31st of March next. This is but a temporary relief, and is founded on the embarrassment occasioned by this bank on the moneyed transactions of the country. What had been the conduct of one of its branches, established at Pittsburg, so late as February last? They discounted somewhere about three hundred thousand dollars, since which they have required twenty-five per cent, as he was informed, to be paid in on all discounts—and would receive no money in payment of that curtail but specie, their own paper, or the paper of the banks of Pittsburg. Was this not calculated to ruin its borrowers, and those banks, and, through those banks, the surrounding banks and the people? When such was the pressure occasioned by this bank, with its present power and facilities, would this House afford additional powers and facilities to further, and more rapidly increase, the present alarming pressure? I trust and hope not, said Mr. M. Sir, unless this gigantic institution is governed by a more liberal and magnanimous policy than hitherto, it will too soon crush the State and local banks, and oppress the majority of this nation. What is the course now, he asked, in the West, in collecting Eastern debts? Why, sir, nothing but money that can be had but by few will be taken in payment; property will be sacrificed for little or nothing, as, in the nature of things, there can be but few purchasers, and the result will be, that the real property of the West will fall into the hands of the wealthy merchants and bank stockholders. Mr. M. said, in every point of view in which he could look at this bill, it was pregnant with evils. He, therefore, hoped it would not pass to a third reading; and moved, that when the question was taken, it should be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. POINDEXTER, of Mississippi, said, that this was a late period of the session, affording no time for a discussion of this bill; and, as no absolute necessity could be alleged for its passage, he moved that the same be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, said he could not see any necessity for the postponement of this bill. If the bill contains incorrect principles, it ought not to pass at all; but, if otherwise, it might as well be adopted now as at the next session of Congress. For his own part, he said, he could not see the impropriety of giving to this institution the power of effecting the objects for which it was established. It must be obvious, he said, that the president and directors were under a moral obligation to comply with their engagements to the United States. What were those engagements? One of them was, to supply a sufficient quantity of paper for the purposes of the revenue. This obligation, it was clear, could not be performed, unless the officers of the bank have it in their power to prepare the paper. No gentleman would deny, that it was physically impossible for them at present to do it. This institution, he said, had been already two years in operation; and, with the most extraordinary exertions, had not been able to issue paper to an amount of more than twenty millions of dollars, more than twelve millions of which sum were post notes, which were, in the course of business, returned to them, and not reissued; so that, in fact, there were but eight millions of paper of the bank in circulation. The interest of the United States, therefore, and the accomplishment of the object for which the bank was established, demanded the passage of this bill.

But, there was another important reason, Mr. F. said, why he thought this bill ought to pass. According to the charter of the bank, there were two or three modes by which the object now sought could be effected by the bank, but in a manner more dangerous to the interests of the community than that proposed. The bank is authorized to trade in bills of exchange, and trades in bills with each of its branches. The directors then have nothing to do but make an order directing the president and cashier of each branch to draw on them small bills, payable to the bearer, and the object is effected. Gentlemen may shake their heads at this suggestion, Mr. F. said, but if they would look at the charter, they would see it might be done. And, as to the fear of such a measure being visited on their heads by the displeasure of this House, the directors had no reason to fear it; for, he said, the bank had already infringed its charter, in his opinion, in an extraordinary manner, and the attempt at an inquiry, even, into their conduct, was suppressed in this House. For an act such as he had suggested as within the power of the bank, the courts of justice would not set aside their charter; and he was for passing this law to remove all temptation to such a course, particularly as he saw no objection to the bill itself. If the gentleman who had spoken of the pressure upon the State banks would look into the subject, he would find that the cause of it was the deficiency of the paper in circulation; for, if there were abundance of the paper of the Bank of the United States in circulation, the State banks could certainly get it. The very objection which he had made to the passage of this bill was really a strong argument in its favor. It did not appear to Mr. F. that there was any reasonable objection to this bill; and any gentleman who would read the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury on this subject must, he thought, be satisfied of the necessity of such a provision as that contained in it.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, inquired whether this bill was founded on a petition from the stockholders? If not, he felt no disposition to act at all upon the subject.

The SPEAKER replied, that there was a petition from the stockholders.

Mr. HARRISON, of Ohio, said, that the opposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania proved, very conclusively, that the people might aim at the same objects, and pursue different courses to attain it. Mr. H. said, he was in favor of the bill for the express reasons assigned by the gentleman from Pennsylvania for voting against it—to remove the pressure on the land offices. This pressure, said Mr. H., had been felt some time, but lately more severely, in consequence of orders from the Secretary of the Treasury prescribing the particular money to be received in payment: From my own knowledge I can say that of that money, the paper of the Bank of the United States, there is scarcely a note to be found in circulation. What was the alternative permitted to those who owed money for public lands? To pay the amount in specie. If the debts due to the United States were to be paid only in a species of paper not to be found, or in specie, was it not evident that the vaults of the State banks must be drained? It had been said, that there was abundance of the paper of the Bank of the United States in the offices of discount and deposit in the Western country. Mr. H. said, if that were the fact, there would have been no necessity for the measure proposed in the bill. But, he believed it was not the fact, and that there was a very small quantity of that paper in the Western country, it being constantly taken up by the merchants, and sent to the great cities of the United States to pay for goods. He was perfectly convinced, he said, that the pressure on the citizens of the West could only be relieved by a measure of the sort now proposed, and was therefore in favor of the bill.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, of Tennessee, hoped the bill would not pass. The Bank of the United States was already a pretty strong bank, and would be stronger some years hence. The State institutions would have to bend before the mammoth bank, as surely as the sun rises in the east and sets in the west; and the more Congress interfered with the charter of that moneyed aristocracy, in the course of its progress, the more they would enable it to operate on the people of the United States. The influences which grow out of moneyed institutions are always felt in every public body and in every state of society; and the older, the more firmly is their power established, the more certain is their influence, not only on this body, but on the people of the United States. Mr. C. said he had always entertained the opinion that the Constitution had never given to this Government the power to establish a National Bank, and he believed the people would feel the effects of the assumption of that power too severely to refuse their assent to the excellence of the principles enforced by the Convention who framed the Constitution, and with much wisdom refused to grant the power to establish such corporations.

With respect to this particular bill, the ground on which it was supported was, that there not being a sufficient quantity of the paper of the bank in circulation, the public revenue could not be collected with convenience to the people who owe money to the Government. Mr. C. apprehended some error on this head, and that, so far as it operated on the people of the States of Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, and, he was sorry to say, the State from which he came, the circulation of the paper of the Bank of the United States and its branches was rather calculated to oppress than to benefit the people. He took a view of the operation of the bank in the Western country. Every branch bank established had the authority to make drafts on the different branches in other States, and on the mother bank. These drafts were sold at a premium, and were paid for in the only money in circulation, the paper of the State banks, with which the branch bank either obtained the specie from the State banks or compelled them to pay interest on the amount. Who lose in this case? Not the holders of bank stock only, but the yeomanry of the country, because the effect was to depress the circulating medium and elevate the price of money in society; and by this operation, those best entitled to the favor of the Government were deprived of the opportunity of getting money to meet the demands which the Government has upon them.

Abandoning the argument that to increase the power of this institution would be ruinous to the independence of the country, which, as yet, he hoped, would survive the establishment of the bank, Mr. C. said he should like any gentleman to show to him any substantial advantage to be gained to the United States by imparting to the bank this power, seeing how unreal the benefits had proved which were promised from the first establishment of the bank. One of the main arguments urged in favor of the establishment of the bank was, that it was to regulate and equalize the currency of the country—a wild theory, Mr. C. said, which would never be realized in any country covering such an extent of territory as this. Money, like water, has its gravitating quality, and will settle down where it is most wanted. The bank, it is found, is totally incapable of producing these consequences. Nay, we find, at the doors of the mother bank itself, it cannot maintain the reputation nor credit of its own branches; for he was told that the notes of some branches had already been sold at a discount of three per cent., though, perhaps, no charge of misconduct could, on that account, be sustained against the president and directors of the bank. It was unnecessary to go into a train of reasoning to show that the branches cannot pay specie for the notes of other branches or of the mother bank. The fact, however, was certain, and it was in vain to expect that an institution of that kind could ever establish an uniform currency, in the sense in which the term had been employed by those who advocated the establishment of the bank.

The second great advantage proposed from the bank was, that, besides putting into circulation a mass of money of equal value to the amount, not only of the whole capital, but of much more, (which it must do, or its dividends can never reach the expectations of the stockholders,) it would prevent the evil and the crime of counterfeiting. Where the notes were all of one form, and signed by one set of officers, counterfeiting would be more difficult than it even yet unfortunately is, from the variety of denominations of notes in circulation, which is enough to confound the most intelligent and discriminating. Change the system by the passage of this bill, multiply and diversify the signatures, and the beneficial effect thus anticipated will at once be lost. For, if there be a necessity to appoint a vice president and vice cashier now, hereafter it will be more necessary, after the extension of the institution, to extend further facilities. It will become necessary that the field of action should be enlarged from time to time, as the influence of the institution extends itself throughout the United States; and, in time, we shall have as various signatures to the notes of the Bank of the United States as we have to those of the old State institutions.

There were not so many inconveniences from the issue of large notes and drafts by the bank as gentlemen imagined. Most of these passed through the State banks and gave them an opportunity of issuing their own notes for them. Nor, Mr. C. said, did he apprehend that the persons who were debtors to the United States could feel the difficulty which had been suggested. Conceiving, in short, that no advantage, but much injury, would result from the measure proposed in this bill, he hoped it would not pass.

Mr. INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, expressed his astonishment at the vehemence of opposition to this bill; for which, he said, it was impossible to account, without supposing some remains of attachment to exist in the breasts of gentlemen, to the rag system, which existed previous to the establishment of the Bank of the United States. It was certainly not necessary now to inquire whether the establishment of that bank was or was not Constitutional, or whether it had in its operation afforded all the advantages anticipated from it. These considerations, Mr. I. said, had nothing to do with the question now before the House, which was in itself so simple that nothing but the prejudice to which he had alluded could have drawn gentlemen into this extraneous discussion. The object was merely to authorize the bank to appoint a vice president and assistant cashier. Now, it was plain, that no one person, suppose he were to sign two thousand notes per day, which Mr. I. understood was the greatest number one person could properly sign, could sign notes to the amount of the capital of the bank, in less than two or three years, and that some aid was necessary to divide the labor of signing with the present officers, in order to enable them to accommodate the public. Suppose the House to refuse to pass this bill, did gentlemen expect to preserve the character of this miserable trash of paper which covers the whole country, without a dollar to support it, which is lent out to anybody who will take it, without credit or property to justify it? Would gentlemen make the situation of these institutions any better by refusing to pass this bill? The consequence of such a refusal would be, that the president and cashier of the bank must be employed exclusively in signing bills of the bank, and on some other persons must be devolved the other important business which properly belonged to those officers.

Mr. MERCER, of Virginia, then addressed the Chair, in opposition to the bill. Its object, he said, was to extend the operations of the bank and its branches where already established, and to enable the bank to establish branches where they do not now exist; and, could he suppose that it was likely, without the proposed indulgence, the stockholders would be disappointed in their reasonable expectations of profit from the bank, he should suppress all the objections to it which he found in his breast, in order to perform what he should consider an obligation of public faith. But, he said, there was no reason to apprehend such a result. The bank had been in operation about fifteen months, the mother bank having gone into operation in January, 1817. At the first semi-annual dividend, they had declared a dividend of four per cent., being at the rate of eight per cent. per annum. This was at the end of the first six months of actual operation, when all the expenses of the organization of the bank, and putting it into operation, were incurred, and must of course have been charged. Mr. M. said he had heard a gentleman deeply interested in this institution say that the bank would be able to divide at least ten per centum per annum, a profit exceeding that of any bank south of the Potomac and north of South Carolina. Congress were therefore not bound, by any considerations of equity or good faith, to do anything to enlarge the profits of the bank, which would be the effect of the system proposed, and must have been the object of the stockholders in asking for it. Mr. M. said he should not, however, be disposed, were it not, in his opinion, forbidden by principles of expediency, to deny to the bank the opportunity of increasing its gain. Although the stock of the bank was now selling at forty-three per cent. above par, he should not refuse a measure which would raise it to an hundred per cent., if he did not feel that the primary interests of the country would suffer by such a course.

It were a sufficient argument against this bill, were there no other, that it would just double the danger of counterfeiting, and the inducements to the commitment of this crime; and in so far would deprive the institution of one of the leading arguments in its favor.

But, Mr. M. was opposed to the bill on other grounds. He had no prejudice, he said, against the moneyed interest. He would protect every one concerned in it by any act of sound legislation. He would not embarrass any of the great interests of the country by a system of narrow legislation. He was not personally a stockholder in any moneyed institution; he was glad at present that he was not in this interest, because he was called upon to exercise his judgment impartially respecting it. In the country which he represented, the profits of this system of banking, Mr. M. said, had been applied to the most beneficial purpose—education. He was indisposed to narrow the profits of the State banks, by extending the operation of this enormous institution in such a manner as to fetter their operations within limits too narrow for existence. He was not disposed to lend the aid of this House to carry the rills of influence from this institution through every valley and hamlet in the country. Let us suppose, said he, a branch of the Bank of the United States established along side of every State bank, and having every one of them indebted to it: I ask, under what circumstances, we shall legislate when called upon, on any occasional pressure, real or imaginary, to suspend specie payments? He looked forward, he said, with apprehension to the extension of this institution. He had been told that the bank only waited the passage of this bill to establish branches all through the State which he represented, and across its mountains. Could it be necessary, for the purpose of enabling the Government to collect its revenue, the ostensible object of the establishment of this bank, to establish more than one or two branches in each State of the Union? Certainly not; but, for the purpose of gain to the bank, branches were to be extended everywhere; and he asked if any benefit could result to the Government from facilitating the means of the bank to carry this object into effect?

Mr. M. said he was not here when this bank was incorporated; but he well remembered the arguments by which it was sustained. The House and the nation were told that the bank would establish an uniform currency, and break down the system of brokerage, so justly obnoxious. But, Mr. M. asked, has the predicted effect resulted, even in the very towns wherein branches are established? No; and can it result? Is it possible for the Bank of the United States to equalize exchange between the different sections of the country? Can they equipoise the balance of trade between the Atlantic and the Western country, until the country manufactures everything itself? The hope is illusory. The bank, he said, did not even attempt to equalize the exchange between this city and Philadelphia, although the mail passes from the one to the other at the rate of an hundred miles per day. If the attempt has ever been made, it is not from a consultation of the great interests of the country, but from personal regard to the individuals who were to be accommodated.

It was true, Mr. M. said, that, if the Treasury persisted in the arrangement relative to the paper receivable at its collectors' and receivers' offices, it becomes important that the paper of the Bank of the United States should have a general circulation. He was willing, for one, however, to give his assent to a bill which should restrain such oppression, and compel the Treasury to receive the paper of all banks which pay specie, instead of giving such a preference to the Bank of the United States, beyond the requirement of the law, as to make necessary the proposed extension of its privileges. We have given, said he, to this moneyed interest, a body to act, a head to meditate, and, moreover, a heart in which, as in every human heart, ambition and avarice have a place. I am unwilling now to give them a power to extend their operations to every valley and to every mountain top, in every State in the Union. Let them stop where, when you gave them their charter, you meant that they should stop—where your revenue is collected. I will resist these encroachments as long as I can, and, if I fail in my object, I shall, at least, have the pleasure of recollecting that I have taken the first opportunity which has offered to raise my voice against them.

It had been said that it was necessary to pass this bill, in order to extend the operations of this bank to the extent of its capital. Already, Mr. M. said, the bank had divided its profits at the rate of eight per cent. per annum; and it would be recollected, that, during the existence of the old Bank of the United States, the circulation of its paper never exceeded seven millions and a few hundred thousand dollars. The banks in the interior must depend for profits on the circulation of their paper; but the Bank of the United States, located in the great cities, was not dependent on any such contingencies for its profits. But, what is the ability of the bank to issue paper with its present officers? It has been in operation fifteen months, and has issued seventeen and a half millions of paper, of which the post notes do not amount to seven millions; leaving eleven millions, in round numbers, in circulation, and these issued within fifteen months. Give to the bank three years' time, and at this rate they will have issued thirty-three millions, and in five or six years sixty or seventy millions! And in time, he had no doubt, they would, without the aid of this bill, supplant all the State institutions. The States, Mr. M. said, had all exacted from the banks which they had chartered heavy premiums; much heavier than that paid by this bank to the United States. The premiums paid by the banks of Virginia had built up a credit for Virginia equal to that of any other State. If this were a new question, for the first time agitated; if Congress were about to create a new system, he would concur with gentlemen; he would in that case have but one bank, and derive all the paper for circulation from one institution, which should be regulated, not by a corporation, because the conduct of moneyed corporations is always ruled by avarice; but by some plan which should insure the conformity of the measures of the bank to a great national policy, &c. But we have long ago passed that stage; and numerous banks have been incorporated over the country, under the strongest pledge of the faith of the States to support them, &c., and Mr. M. said, he would not, in his new character of a representative in Congress, do that which he should be ashamed to do in another, by lending his vote to injure the banks which had paid premiums to the States, of an amount which could not be justified by the state of things which must follow the further extension of the Bank of the United States.

As to the suggestion which had been thrown out, that, if the passage of this bill were refused, the bank could accomplish its object by issuing paper in the shape of bills of exchange, Mr. M. asked, if bills of exchange were payable to bearer? He had never seen any such; they are always payable to order. But if the bank did attempt in that manner to supply a circulating medium, would it not be a violation of their charter? Were gentlemen willing to put such a construction on the act of incorporation? Mr. M. knew very well, he said, that such an institution may buy half the legal talents of the country, and obtain authority for very ingenious constructions of a plain provision. But, said he, we have the power to restrain avarice, and defeat ingenuity, and I look to that source for some consolation.

He concluded by saying, he trusted the motion for indefinite postponement would prevail by a large majority; it had his most hearty approbation. He regretted that it was now too late a period of the session to discuss, as it ought to be treated, a subject so interesting, and of which so many views might be taken, that it was impossible, in this brief debate, to do it anything like justice.

Mr. WHITMAN, of Massachusetts, expressed his surprise at the course of this discussion; the question being simply whether Congress would grant relief to the president and cashier of the Bank of the United States, from the oppressive labor of signing bills; for it was those officers who were suffering. The bills of the bank must be signed, and these officers were now compelled to work night and day, and perform labors calculated to destroy their constitutions and shorten their lives. The interest of the institution required these labors, besides the other important duties required of them, and they must be performed. If the constitutions of the present officers fail, they must give way, and others be chosen, not for their abilities, but for their robust constitutions. This must be done, and will be done. The gentleman from Virginia supposed the bank could not accomplish their object by means of bills of exchange. But Mr. W. said, he could tell the gentleman what they could and would do. In any of the branches, when deposits were made, they would authorize receipts to be given by small or large sums, and payable to bearer, signed by the president and cashier, and which would everywhere circulate as money. Would not this be a greater inconvenience than to have bills signed by two sets of individuals, as proposed by the bill? Certainly the opposition to the bill was very unreasonable. If gentlemen apprehended any danger from the bill, let them limit it to three years, or even a shorter time. But, in some shape, it was evident the bill ought to pass.

Mr. S. SMITH, of Maryland, said, he had made up his mind to take no part in the present discussion, nor should he have risen, but for an observation, to wit: that the reporter of the bank charter (Mr. CALHOUN) had assured the public, that the bank would regulate the exchanges throughout every part of the Union. I was not (said he) in Congress when the charter was reported by that gentleman, as chairman of the committee on national currency, but I took my seat before it was called up for discussion, and, having taken a part in the debate, I gave it my attention, and I think I may say, that the assurances were to this effect, "that the bank would tend greatly to equalize the exchanges between the several States and with foreign nations." Has it had that effect? I think it has, and more rapidly than was expected by its most sanguine friends. What was our situation when the bank charter passed? An almost general depreciation of bank notes. The money of Baltimore, and this District, was 20 per cent. less value than that of Boston, 15 per cent. less than that of New York, and 10 per cent. less than either Philadelphia, or Virginia; yet the fact was well ascertained to Congress, that the banks of Baltimore had more specie in their vaults, in proportion to their capital, and notes in circulation, than either the banks of Philadelphia or New York, and equal to those of Virginia: the difference between the notes of Virginia and Philadelphia, and those of Boston, was ten per cent. The Boston banks paid their notes in specie; no other State banks did. The result was that the merchants and people of the States, whose banks paid in paper, paid less real value to the Treasury, for the duties and taxes, than the Eastern people. Baltimore, for instance, paid only 80 dollars when Boston paid 100 to the Treasury. This was a just subject of complaint. How was this to be obviated? Some gentlemen thought the State banks could be coerced to resume specie payments, but Congress had no power over them. That subject was very fully discussed. The State banks believed they could not, with safety to themselves, undertake to resume specie payments. And, although I differed with them in opinion at the time, yet I am now free to confess, that they could not have resumed without the aid of the Bank of the United States. Baltimore owed, at that time, to New York, one million five hundred thousand dollars, which debt was thrown principally on the United States Branch for payment. Had the banks of Baltimore undertaken to pay their debts in specie, all they had in their vaults would have been drawn out to pay that debt, and the debts due to Virginia, Philadelphia, and Boston. The branch bank discharged those debts in effective money. I have said, "that the bank equalized the exchange more rapidly than could have been expected." Yes, sir, in a very few months after its organization, the exchanges from Boston to Richmond were at par, and have so continued. Some difference of exchange exists in Charleston, Savannah, and New Orleans, but not more than the cost of transporting specie from Philadelphia, perhaps two to three per cent. The facilities given to the Eastern merchant, by the bank paper, fully compensates him in his purchases of cotton for that small loss. Bank paper of the United States passes in every part of the United States, in all purchases, equal to gold or silver; and why should it not? All debts due by the bank, either for its notes or accounts, are paid in specie when demanded. I know of no instance where specie has been refused by the bank, or any of its branches, to any person having a right to demand it. I speak with confidence when I say, none such has occurred in Baltimore. The demand for specie, for the trade beyond the Cape of Good Hope, has been immense—much greater, I understand, than formerly. To meet that demand, and to reinstate public confidence in bank notes, the bank has been under the necessity of importing specie to a large amount. To what extent, I know not; but I may venture to say, little short of four millions. And I understand, they have agents, purchasing specie, in Europe and the West Indies, which they pay for by bills of exchange purchased from the merchants. Bills of exchange on London, when the bank began, were about par in Boston, ten per cent. above par in Philadelphia, twenty per cent. in Baltimore and this District. They are at present one to one and a half per cent. above par at all those cities, and will soon be at par. From this view, it is evident, that the bank has effected the object relative to the exchanges which had been contemplated by its friends, and this good has been effected without any material injury to any of the State banks. It is true, the bank operates as a check to those institutions. They are now under the necessity of curtailing their operations, and of doing only as much business as their capital and deposits will justify. Those banks which are sound, and discreetly managed, will probably divide, in future, eight per cent. They can no longer inundate the country with paper. The Bank of the United States, as far as I have been informed, has acted towards them the most friendly part. I may say that they are on friendly terms in Baltimore. Every kind of accommodation that either can, with propriety, give, has been afforded. Harmony, and a good understanding, is mutually useful; and, I have no doubt that the real interest of both will induce a continuance of forbearance and friendship towards each other.

The facility of merchants and others transferring their funds from one part of the Union to the other, without risk, by means of bank drafts, is very great. For instance, does any member want to send money from hence to Boston, New Orleans, Kentucky, or any part of the Union, where there is a branch? He has only to apply to the branch bank in this city, and he will receive a check, payable to whom he pleases, on the branch nearest to the place of his residence. If a merchant in Baltimore wants to pay his debt in New York, he has only to apply to the branch bank, and he will receive a check, payable to his creditor in New York, on the branch bank here. This, Mr. Speaker, is the common course; but there are times when the balance of trade may be so much against one city, and in favor of another, that drafts of the bank cannot be given, and such cases have happened, and will again happen. Whenever they do, the mother bank uses its best endeavors, by a supply of specie, to correct the inconvenience. The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MEXCER,) complains, that he applied at the branch bank for a check on New York, and was refused. But how did he apply? Did he offer the United States bank notes? No, sir—he offered the notes of one of the District banks; and, certainly, ought not to have expected, that the branch bank would have given him a check on New York for paper not its own. Every bank, or branch, is bound to take care of itself. The United States own one-fifth of all the stock of the National Bank, and ought, and will expect care and caution on the part of the bank and its branches. The gentleman might as well have brought district notes to the branch, and demanded specie for them; for, with the check of the branch, his friend at New York could have demanded specie for its amount. The same gentleman believes, that Government did not receive an equivalent for the charter. I differ with him entirely. The United States own one-fifth of the stock, which is paid for, say seven millions in five per cent. stock.

If the bank divides eight per cent. then the Government gain three per cent. on its seven millions, say two hundred and ten thousand dollars per annum; or, for twenty years, the charter term, - - - - - $4,200,000
 Bonus $1,500,000, with interest thereon, in twenty years, above - - - 3,000,000
 Twenty loan offices saved, the bank being bound to do the duty of loan offices, and to pay all the pensions to its own cost, $100,000 per annum, or, for twenty years - - - 2,000,000

Gain in twenty years to the U. States $9,200,000

Thus the actual positive gain to the United States by the bank, during its term of twenty years, will exceed $9,200,000. The bank is, besides, compelled, at its own cost, to place money wherever the same may be required within the United States, for the wants of the Government; for this and the collection and safe-keeping of the public money, it has an equivalent in the public deposits. There is one good which has resulted to the Treasury from the establishment of the bank, and to which I beg leave to call the attention of the House. It is that, when the bank began to act, the Secretary of the Treasury placed with it bank notes of the interior banks to an amount exceeding $4,500,000, which had been received for taxes and public land. Those notes were of no more use to the Treasury than so much blank paper. They would pay no debt. The bank, by its agents, and its own cost, have realized above $3,000,000 thereof, without injury to such banks. The balance of perhaps $1,500,000, cannot be collected. The banks have not the means of payment, and, it is feared, that much of that large sum is in jeopardy. Some have agreed to pay interest, whilst others can do nothing towards payment. The establishment of the bank has effectually cured such evil in future, and will check the interior banks from an intolerable emission of paper, injurious to the credit of bank notes. They are now confined, as they ought to be, to issue notes only in proportion to their capital and deposits. If the United States Bank had not been established, the depreciation of bank notes, which had already commenced to an alarming degree, would have continued until they had become little better than continental money, and been ruinous to the country.

What does the bill propose? Simply to authorize the bank to appoint a vice president and vice cashier, whose sole business shall be to sign bank notes, and why? Because it has been found physically impossible for the president and cashier to sign notes sufficient for the medium required for the use of the country. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Moore,) opposes the bill, and, at the same time, tells you, that a bill has passed giving further time for the payment of land in Ohio, because there is not specie in the country, or United States Bank notes in that State, wherewith to pay—and why, Mr. Speaker? The reason is obvious, to wit: that the president and cashier cannot sign notes sufficient to supply the branches in Ohio, and other States. The bill, if passed, would save that difficulty, and, surely, the gentleman ought, from his own showing, to vote for the bill. But he tells us that the branch at Pittsburg has acted very improperly towards its customers. I am sorry for it; I know not the cause, but suppose that the directors have been checked by the mother bank for having, in the commencement of their operations, discounted too liberally; and I have no doubt that in a few weeks the business will be accommodated satisfactorily.

Mr. Speaker one great object of the bank was to afford an adequate circulating medium, that would be uniform throughout the Union. To effect this it is necessary to have a sufficient number of notes signed, to enable the bank to put twenty millions of dollars in circulation. The president and cashier cannot (having their other business to attend to) sign more than fifteen hundred notes each day. At that rate it would require more than four years for them to sign the number and kind necessary for circulation. And what harm can result from granting this facility? I can conceive of none. It has been alleged that the bank will put too many notes in circulation. This cannot be; the charter confines them; and if it did not, I am certain they could not put out more notes than two thirds the amount of their capital. No bank can, (when it is compelled to pay specie) unless where there is but one bank in a city, into which all the deposits of the merchants are received. If the deposits are on an average equal to the amount of the capital, then the bank can safely issue more notes. This cannot happen with the Bank of the United States or any of its branches.

The gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. CLAIBORNE) has said that the notes of the State banks pass equal to gold and silver in their vicinities, and therefore the United States Bank notes are not required in any great number. The gentleman may be, and perhaps is, generally correct; but he knows well that the State bank notes have little or no currency out of their immediate neighborhood. The notes of the interior banks will not pass in the cities of their own State. The gentleman knows that the district notes will not pass in Baltimore, nor Baltimore notes in Philadelphia; which city he has lately visited.

Banks, Mr. Speaker, are frequently complained of, and often without cause. The directors are delicately situated; they are acting for others, and are bound to act with caution. If they, by a desire to oblige, extend their discounts too liberally, if they issue too many notes, if they credit indiscriminately, they endanger the institution to save themselves; they will be compelled to check suddenly their discounts, as has been the case probably at Pittsburg, and thereby cause injury to individuals. If the banks refuse discounts to some, although there may be good cause, those persons are offended; consider themselves aggrieved, and are loud in their complaints. Banks are desirous of making good dividends, and will always discount good paper when their own situation will permit. Banks may be run upon for specie to their great disadvantage, and to that of commerce in general; for in such cases they must lessen their discounts, to save their specie. This of course injures all the merchants not engaged in the export of the precious metals. In case of a great demand for specie, such as has lately been felt, the banks become cautious, and perhaps refuse discounts to persons who they know want to export, or to draw the dollars and sell them to exporters. This causes an outcry against the banks. To such complaints we should pay little attention. The principal demand for specie has been upon the Bank of the United States and its branches, not only for export, but to supply the vaults of State banks lately created. Virginia has established a number, I believe, called the Valley banks, each of which were compelled to have a certain amount of specie in their vaults before they could commence business. Those banks have had recourse to the Bank of the United States for part of their specie, and have been supplied. That specie will probably soon find its way back into the bank or its branches, by the course of trade, (for the notes of those banks will pay no debt in any of the cities) and that circumstance will be a new source of complaint.

Mr. Speaker, the bill, if it should pass, will be of utility to the banks of the interior; the notes will be made more numerous; they will supply a medium; will be received by the farmers for their produce, carried into the country, deposited in the banks of their vicinity, and there be kept, until required by the country merchant to pay his debts to the merchants of the city; and thereby save the interior banks from being drawn upon for all their specie. The National Bank notes are to all intents and purposes equal to gold, and silver, for all the uses of the interior banks. And when they come to understand its utility as well as the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. CLAIBORNE) they will take every fair means to procure those notes. That gentleman has told you that already the interior banks have begun to understand their utility, and secure them whenever they can, considering them as a full security to meet demands upon them, which otherwise would draw away their specie.

In fine, Mr. Speaker, I think I can see that some good will result from the bill now before the House, and no possible evil, and, therefore, it shall have my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, considered it entirely improper to go into the merits of the establishment of the Bank of the United States; nor would he say anything of the influence of that bank—he had voted against that influence, and had nothing more to say on that question. He should confine himself to one point; and, in voting in favor of the bill, he should not do it under the influence of the Bank of the United States. He should vote for it, to give to the State banks an equal chance, believing that it will operate in their favor. At present, in Kentucky, for instance, a merchant will accumulate, in his possession, paper of the local banks; will go to Lexington with his five or ten thousand dollars, deposit his notes in the branch bank, and take a check on Philadelphia. The State institutions have no opportunity to get the paper of the Bank of the United States, because there is none in circulation. The consequence is, that the local institutions become tributary to the Bank of the United States. As long as the State banks pay their notes in specie, and the Bank of the United States alone imports specie, it is advantageous, for the purpose of preserving the solvency of the local institutions, that the notes of the Bank of the United States shall have a general circulation. In this view of the subject, alone, Mr. J. said, he should vote for the bill.

Mr. CLAIBORNE again spoke, pretty much in detail, against the bill, as unnecessary on any pretext. He entered into sundry calculations to show, that, by signing bills for five hours a day, of as low denominations as ten dollars, one person might sign, in one year, to the amount of twenty-eight million five hundred thousand dollars, on a moderate computation; but, if part of the bills were of a larger denomination, to a double amount, &c. As to the parental care over the State banks, which the gentleman from Maryland ascribed to the Bank of the United States, it was a care much the same as that of a jealous step-mother, and its power over them as great as that of a parent over an enfeebled child.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, said, he had one or two objections to the bill. In the first place, the bank had not asked for the passage of such a bill. They had asked, that the presidents and cashiers of the branches might be authorized to sign bills; but this, even the gentleman from Maryland was not willing to concede to the bank. The passage of this bill, he also said, would not serve the purpose avowed by its supporters, of relieving the pressure felt from the want of a sufficient quantity of circulating medium. The reason the notes of the Bank of the United States were not in general circulation was, that those who were interested in the State banks laid hands on them for the purpose of depositing them in those banks, and thus put them out of circulation. The president of the bank could very easily sign as many notes as it would be prudent for the bank to issue, and ten other men to sign notes would not remove the difficulty. If the bank had asked the passage of such a law, he would go more seriously into the consideration of the proposition; but their not having done so he regarded as an objection, at the threshold, fatal to the bill.

Mr. FORSYTH replied to Mr. TAYLOR, that the stockholders of the bank had asked relief in one shape; and if Congress, disapproving that, chose substantively to grant relief in another way, it surely could not be improper. With regard to the scarcity of the paper of the Bank of the United States in circulation, it was owing, not so much to the cause suggested by the gentleman from New York, as to the difficulty of preparing paper of a shape fitted for common use, that is, of small denominations. The passage of this bill was essential to the public interest, and to the convenience of the people generally, inasmuch as it was impracticable for the present officers to prepare such paper in proper quantities. Mr. F. then went into a train of reasoning to show the difficulties under which the community labored from the scarcity of this paper.

Mr. T. M. NELSON, of Virginia, spoke briefly against the bill—

When the question was taken on the indefinite postponement of the bill; and decided by yeas and nays; for the postponement, 85 against it 50, as follows:

INVALID PENSIONS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the general invalid pensioners' bill.

This bill, as usual, occupied the Committee some hours, and produced considerable discussion, arising on motions by different gentlemen, to insert in the bill the names of various invalid soldiers, either not previously sent to the Committee on Pensions, or reported on unfavorably by that committee. These cases rarely involve any new principle, and are too confined in their interest to require particular notice.

The only motion which varied materially from the general character, on this subject, was one made by Mr. CLAY, to insert the name of Charles Earnest, an orphan boy, in the bill, as a pensioner. The facts in this case, as stated by Mr. CLAY, were, that the father of this boy, Charles Earnest, received a wound at Bladensburg which caused his death, leaving his infant son destitute and unprotected, and the more forlorn, as he is both deaf and dumb. To defray the expenses of educating this unfortunate child at the asylum of the deaf and dumb, in Connecticut, Mr. C. moved to authorize the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars a year, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War; and followed his motion by a short, but touching appeal to the generous and patriotic feelings of the House.

The motion was carried without opposition, and almost without a dissenting voice.

The Committee then proceeded with the bill, on which it was busily engaged till between six and seven o'clock, when, having gone through with it, the Committee rose and reported it with some amendments to the House.

The House then adjourned.

FRIDAY, April 17.

Mr. S. SMITH presented the petition of the owners of the private armed schooner Midas, on behalf of themselves, the officers and crew of said schooner, praying to be allowed the bounty granted by the act of March 19, 1814, on a crew of black prisoners of war, which was brought into port by the said private armed vessel.—Laid on the table.

The Committee on Commerce and Manufactures were discharged from the consideration of the resolution submitted yesterday, by Mr. POINDEXTER, upon the subject of an act of the General Assembly of the State of Mississippi.

Mr. SEYBERT, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act concerning tonnage and discriminating duties in certain cases," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Samuel F. Hooker," reported the same without amendment; and the bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill for the relief of B. and P. Jourdan and Brothers.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the Committee on that part of the President's Message which relates to Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act fixing the compensation of Indian agents and factors," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was ordered to be read the third time to-morrow.

The Committee on Military Affairs were discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of John H. Piatt and Camillus Griffith, and they were laid on the table.

The Committee on Naval Affairs were discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the surgeons in the Navy of the United States, as also from the resolution adopted on the 11th of December last, respecting the rank and emoluments of navy surgeons, and they were laid on the table.

Mr. BURWELL, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Jonathan Elliot, and the report of the Secretary of State thereon, reported a bill authorizing a subscription to an edition of Domestic State Papers; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SCOTT, from the committee appointed for the purpose, reported a bill to suspend the sales of certain lands in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. PLEASANTS, the Secretary of the Navy was instructed to lay before this House, at an early period of the next session of Congress, a statement of the different places in the United States in which provision is made for the accommodation of seamen under the several laws relating to the navy and marine hospitals, the number of persons, as nearly as it can be ascertained, annually accommodated at each, and the expense attending the same; also, an estimate of the costs which will attend the erection of a naval hospital at this place, sufficiently large for the number of persons annually provided for.

The House then took up the amendments of the Senate to the bill to enforce neutrality.

The House, on motion of Mr. FORSYTH, disagreed to that amendment of the Senate, which proposed to continue in force so much of the act of 1797, as makes it punishable by the courts of the United States, for a citizen to take out of the limits of the United States a commission to serve against any foreign Power in amity with the United States.

The remainder of the amendments of the Senate were agreed to by the House, and were little more than verbal, with the exception of two: one of which proposed to punish the delivery of commissions from a foreign Government to vessels, &c., within the United States; the other, was the rejection by the Senate of the section incorporated in the bill in this House, on the motion of Mr. CLAY. This section was stated by Mr. FORSYTH to be wholly unnecessary, since the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Palmer and others—parts of which Mr. F. read to the House.

The House then took up the report of the Committee of the whole House, on the bill concerning invalid pensioners; and, after receiving and discussing numerous amendments proposed thereto, the bill was finally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House (having, on motion of Mr. LOWNDES, previously discharged the Committee of the whole House therefrom) took up successively the bills "supplementary to the several acts relative to direct tax and internal duties," and "for changing the compensation of Receivers and Registers of land offices," and spent nearly two hours busily in maturing the details of these bills; after which they were severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill supplementary to the several acts making appropriations for the year 1818; also, on the bill to regulate and fix the compensation of clerks in the different offices; and on the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act fixing the compensation of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, and of the clerks employed in their offices; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported the said bills with amendments to each, and their agreement to the amendments proposed by the Senate to the last-mentioned bill.

The amendments to the bill supplementary to the several acts making appropriations for the year 1818, were read and concurred in by the House; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

The amendments to the bill, entitled "An act fixing the compensation of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, and of the clerks employed in their offices," were read and concurred in by the House.

The amendments to the bill to regulate and fix the compensation of clerks in the different offices, were read and concurred in by the House; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of Madam Poidevin; which was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the resolution "directing the completion of the survey of the waters of the Chesapeake bay, and for the establishment of naval arsenals, and for other purposes," with amendments; in which amendments they ask the concurrence of this House.

The Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims were discharged from a further consideration of the several petitions and other matters referred to them, and upon which they have not reported; and they were laid upon the table.

An engrossed bill to authorize the recovery of public moneys, was read the third time, and ordered to lie on the table.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the houses of Thomas and John Clifford, Elisha Fisher and Company, Thomas Clifford and Son, and Thomas Clifford of Philadelphia, and Charles Wirgman of Baltimore," were read, and concurred in by the House.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. TRIMBLE submitted the following resolutions, viz:

1. Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, instructed to report to this House, at an early period of the next session of Congress, whether any, and, if any, what reduction may be made in the Military Peace Establishment of the United States with safety to the public service.

2. Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, instructed to report to this House at an early period of the next session of Congress, whether any, and, if any, what change ought to be made in the ration established by law; and also report a system for the establishment of a commissariat for the army.

Mr. TRIMBLE said that, intending to bring this subject before the House at this session, he had, with that view, paid some attention to the present Peace Establishment, but the bill from the Senate proposing a reduction in the medical and hospital staff had come up too late to hope for a general reformation. From the discussion which took place on that part of the bill, proposing a change in the law touching the contractors, it was manifest that information was wanted on the subject of a commissariat; and, as that subject must necessarily be acted on at the next session, it would probably be best to have a report from the War Department, made out upon mature reflection, and which would serve as a proposition to act upon. He knew that it would be highly improper to consume time by stating the principles upon which the Military Peace Establishment of the United States ought to be predicated, and still more improper to go into details on the subject. He would only add, that a saving of half a million, he might say seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars could be made, and the army be left as efficient, he would say more efficient than it was at present. Indeed, it was impossible to say what sums could be saved by the establishment of a commissariat, properly organized, for our service.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, opposed the resolution, and briefly referred to the various fortifications and extensive frontiers to show, that a reduction would be incompatible with the public interest; another objection was, that this resolution would leave many officers in doubt as to the length of their continuance in service. He concluded, by moving that the words "of the expenses of," be inserted after the word "reduction."

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, opposed this amendment, and advocated the resolution, on the ground, that the present Military Establishment was more expensive than it ought to be, and was larger than necessary; it being his opinion, as declared on a former occasion, that an army of six thousand was amply sufficient for a Peace Establishment.

Mr. REED made some remarks of the same character, in favor of the resolution; and hoped the report would be required at an early period, and suggested the introduction of these words, which were accepted by the mover, and inserted.

Mr. MILLER made a few remarks against the first resolution, and moved that it be stricken out of the proposition.—This motion was lost.

After some further conversation, Mr. SMITH's motion was agreed to; and, as amended, the resolution was adopted.

The House then took a recess until half after seven o'clock P. M.

HALF PAST SEVEN O'CLOCK P. M.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the public buildings and for furnishing the Capitol and President's House," were read, and the first thereof disagreed to, and the residue concurred in by the House.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the resolution "directing the completion of the survey of the waters of the Chesapeake bay, and for the establishment of naval arsenals and other purposes," were read and concurred in by the House.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to increase the salaries of certain officers therein mentioned," be discharged, and that the bill be committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill for the relief of Cornelia Mason.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to alter and establish certain post roads. The bill was reported with sundry amendments; which were read and concurred in by the House, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of Cornelia Mason; also, on bills from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs of Landon Carter;" and "An act to increase the salaries of certain officers of Government therein mentioned;" and after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

SATURDAY, April 18.

Ordered, That the select committee, appointed on the 17th of December last, on the subject of extinguishing the Indian title to lands granted by Virginia to her officers and soldiers in the Revolutionary army, be discharged from the consideration of the petitions and other matters referred to them upon which they have not acted, and that they lie on the table.

Ordered, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the consideration of the charges preferred by Edwin Lewis against Judge Toulmin, and that the papers connected therewith lie on the table.

Ordered, That the committee appointed on the petitions of Benjamin and John Wells, and John Webster, be discharged, and that the petitions lie on the table.

Ordered, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the consideration of the petitions and other matters and things referred to them at the present session upon which they have not acted.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the committee to whom was referred the report of the select committee upon the expenses incurred under the 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th articles of the Treaty of Ghent, made a supplemental report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Ordered, That the committee appointed on the 27th ultimo, upon the subject of prosecutions of petitions of right and informations of intrusion, in cases wherein the United States are concerned, be continued, with power to report thereon at the next session of Congress.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Benjamin O. Tyler, accompanied with a copy of the Declaration of American Independence, which he has lately executed and published; being, as he states, "the first and only fac simile copy of the signatures of that document ever copied or published;" which letter was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act fixing the compensation of Indian agents and factors," was read the third time, and passed.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act to establish and alter certain post roads; An act concerning invalid pensioners; An act for the relief of Madame Poidevin; An act to regulate and fix the compensation of clerks in the different offices; An act supplementary to the several acts relative to direct taxes and internal duties; An act supplementary to the several acts making appropriations for the year 1818; An act for changing the compensation of receivers and registers of land offices; and An act to suspend the sales of certain lands in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri; were severally read a third time, and passed.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act concerning tonnage and discriminating duties in certain cases;" and the same being amended, the amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time to-day; which was subsequently done, and the bill passed.

The Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs of Landon Carter," was discharged, and the bill postponed indefinitely.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of Cornelia Mason; also on the bills of the Senate, entitled "An act to increase the salaries of certain officers of Government;" and "An act authorizing a subscription for the Statistical Annals of Adam Seybert, and the purchase of Pitkin's Commercial Statistics. The first and last mentioned bills were reported without amendment, and the second mentioned bill with amendments.

The bill for the relief of Cornelia Mason was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-day; which was subsequently done, and the bill passed.

The House then took up the bill authorizing a subscription for the Statistical Annals of Adam Seybert, and the purchase of Pitkin's Commercial Statistics; when a motion was made by Mr. Ingham, to amend the said bill by striking out that part thereof which proposes to purchase five hundred copies of Pitkin's Commercial Statistics; which motion was rejected; and the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-day.

RELIEF OF GENERAL STARK.

Mr. BUTLER, of Vermont, moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill for the relief of Major General John Stark, with the view of getting the bill before the House, and having it acted on; and to induce the House to consent to this course, Mr. B. made a few remarks, stating that General Stark was now at the great age of ninety years and in indigent circumstances, and trusted the House would not refuse to extend relief to this aged and meritorious veteran.

Mr. HARRISON hoped the House would agree to the motion, for, in addition to the great age of General Stark, he was, Mr. H. understood, in bad health, and consequently his life very precarious. If the late period of the session was objected to taking up the bill, Mr. H. said he should move that the House meet to-morrow, for the Sabbath could not be better spent than in legislating to alleviate the distress of a veteran hero; and he begged that the House would not adjourn without doing something for the relief of this venerable and indigent soldier of the Revolution.

The motion of Mr. BUTLER was agreed to; and the House took up the bill to grant to Major General Stark a pension, during life, of — dollars per month, from the 4th day of last July.

Mr. BUTLER moved to fill the blank with forty dollars; and Mr. LIVERMORE moved to insert sixty, which he said would be the same as the pension granted to General St. Clair.

The last motion being first in order, the question was taken thereon, and the sum of sixty dollars agreed to without a division.

Mr. RUGGLES moved to insert in the bill some provision for the relief of Hannah Leighton, formerly wife of Captain Isaac Davis, who was killed in one of the first battles of the Revolution, that at Concord, in April, 1775.

Mr. LIVERMORE hoped the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts would not be made. A pension was to be granted to Major General Stark in consideration of his services in the Revolutionary war. He could see no reason for coupling the old lady with him at so late a stage of his life, unless it should appear that she also had performed military services; suitable provision might be made for her separately.

Mr. RUGGLES's motion was negatived without a division; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-day, and subsequently read a third time, and passed.

DAY OF ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MOORE offered a resolution to rescind the joint resolution of Congress which fixed the termination of the session at the 20th instant, and to authorize the adjournment on the 22d, but subsequently agreed to leave the day blank, and referred the House to the mass of business before them to show that an adjournment could not take place at the period agreed on without detriment to the public interest.

Mr. H. NELSON also supported the motion, and particularized some bills that were of high and pressing importance to the public interest, which must necessarily be passed over, as time sufficient was not left for their consideration.

Mr. HOPKINSON opposed the motion, because, if the adjournment were postponed a day or two only, as had been suggested, the House would find itself then just where it was now. The subject referred to by Mr. NELSON would alone take ten or twelve days to mature; if the House would agree to fix a day as distant as that, he was willing to go with them; but a shorter time would be useless, and as the two Houses had now determined on a day, he was opposed to rescinding it for the sake of gaining one or two days.

Messrs. TERRY and DESHA also opposed the motion, and Mr. HARRISON advocated it; after which, on motion of Mr. INGHAM, the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. H. NELSON subsequently called it up, and on the question of proceeding to consider the resolution, it was decided in the negative by yeas and nays—yeas 38, nays 81.

AFRICAN COLONIZATION.

Mr. MERCER, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of the annual meeting of the Society of Friends, held in Baltimore, and sundry other memorials and petitions upon the subject of colonizing the free people of color of the United States, made a report thereon; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole. The report is as follows:

The committee to whom was referred the memorial of the "President and Board of Managers of the American Society for Colonizing the Free People of Color of the United States," have, according to order, had the same under their attentive consideration.

Referring to the memorial itself, and to the report of the Committee on the Slave Trade, to the fourteenth Congress, your committee beg leave to add, that a new interest has been recently imparted to the benevolent enterprise of the memorialists, by the prospect of a speedy termination of that traffic, which has been so long the crime of Europe, the scourge of Africa, and the affliction and disgrace of America. Spain and Portugal have at length concurred in that just and humane policy of the United States, which Great Britain was the first to imitate, and which, by her liberal and unremitting zeal, she has successfully extended throughout the civilized world.

So far as the civilization of Africa—the victim of this inhuman traffic—is embraced among the views of the memorialists, the removal of this formidable impediment to their success is calculated to elevate the hopes of the philanthropist, and to secure to their enterprise a larger share of public confidence.

America cannot but sympathize in the wish to redeem from ignorance, barbarism and superstition, a continent of vast extent, spread out beneath every climate, embracing every variety of soil, and inhabited by a much-injured and degraded portion of the human race.

But, your committee have no hesitation in acknowledging that they derive a yet stronger incentive to recommend this enterprise to the concurrence and favor of the House, from considerations peculiar to the United States. They were presented to the last Congress by the report to which your committee have referred; and they deem it unnecessary, therefore, to press them upon the attention of the House. They cannot, however, forbear to remark, that time is unceasingly aggravating all those domestic evils, for which the memorialists propose the only competent remedy; and that the most auspicious circumstances conspire, at present, to promote its successful application.

Europe, after passing through a war of unprecedented extent and calamity, enjoys a repose which she has rarely known, and which, for the honor of humanity, it may be hoped she will be disposed to signalize by some act of distinguished generosity. She will not surely be content with a mere forbearance of further injustice, but seek to repair the wrongs which she has inflicted upon an unhappy race of men.

The people of the United States have retired from the same conflict, to enjoy a prosperity which has never been surpassed in the history of the world. Respected abroad, they possess abundance, tranquillity, and happiness, at home.

A survey of such blessings naturally inspires a sentiment, the existence of which is illustrated, not only by the formation of the society from which this memorial proceeds—a society embracing individuals of every religious and political denomination, and inhabitants of every State in this wide-spread Union—but by the almost unanimous proceedings of the Legislatures of Virginia, Maryland, Tennessee, and Georgia, either recommending or countenancing the same benevolent object.

It cannot be supposed that the liberal and enlightened policy which dictated the resolutions and acts of these particular States, is confined to themselves alone. Their neighbors, alike circumstanced, actuated by the same interests and feelings, will be conducted to the same conclusions, in relation to questions not only of vital importance to them, but, in their remote bearing, of scarcely less moment to the stability and prosperity of the Union.

The auxiliary Colonization Societies which are daily springing up in other quarters of the United States, evince, that if the feelings which animate them were local in their origin, they required only to be manifested, in order to awaken the sympathy and to secure the co-operation of the rest of America, in the attainment of their common object.

Your committee would not thus favorably regard the prayer of the memorialists, if it sought to impair in the slightest degree the rights of private property, or the yet more sacred rights of personal liberty, secured to every description of freemen in the United States.

The resolution of the Legislature of Virginia; the subsequent acts and declarations, as well as the high character of the memorialists themselves, added to the most obvious interest of the States who have recently sanctioned the purpose, or recognised the existence of the American Colonization Society; exclude the remotest apprehension of such injustice or inhumanity.

The memorialists propose to attain the noblest end which benevolence can conceive, by temperate and practicable means.

As preliminary to their success, and in anticipation of the acts of the Government, they have, at considerable expense, sent out agents to explore the coast of Africa, and to select a seat for their contemplated colony. These agents were instructed, first, to visit Europe. Their reception in England, and the intelligence which had been received from them, down to the period of their late embarkation for Africa, were as favorable as could have been anticipated to the success of their mission. This success, however, cannot be complete, until the object of the memorialists shall have received the sanction, and their efforts the aid, of the Federal Government.

If their memorial does not furnish sufficient ground for the interposition of the National Legislature in their behalf, it appears to your committee that the resolutions of Virginia (which they beg leave to subjoin to this report) subsequently sustained by a similar resolution of Maryland and Tennessee, unquestionably do so.

Whether a treaty for the territory of the proposed colony is to be opened with the native tribes of Africa, or with the European Governments which claim certain portions of the shores of that continent, it is by the authority of the United States alone that such negotiation can be effected.

The several States, having, by their adoption of the Federal Constitution, surrendered the power of negotiation to the Federal Government, have an undoubted right to claim the exercise of that sovereign authority for their benefit, whenever it can be exerted, consistently with the welfare of the United States.

Your committee cannot forbear to add another, to them a very solemn consideration, as an inducement for the exercise of this authority, in the manner proposed by the General Assembly of Virginia. The act of Congress, which interdicts the African slave trade, and subjects the citizens of the United States, who engage in its prosecution, to merited punishment, has left the unfortunate beings, whom the violators of this law are daily casting upon the American shores, to the separate provisions of the respective States, within whose jurisdiction they may chance to be found.

To say nothing of the abstract propriety of transferring such an authority over the persons and liberty of these foreigners, from the National to the State Legislatures; entertaining no apprehension that Congress will be rendered thereby accessory to any act of cruelty or inhumanity, it must be, yet, apparent, that the individual States have a right to require the aid now sought to be obtained from the General Government, in order to enable themselves to discharge the trust reposed in them, without a violation of their local policy, or injustice to those unfortunate Africans, placed at their disposal by the laws of the United States.

Your committee were instructed by two other resolutions of the House, to inquire into the expediency of making more effectual provision, by law, for preventing the participation of the citizens of the United States in the African slave trade, and of correcting certain abuses which are practised in the internal commerce of the United States. Both these objects have been accomplished by bills which subsequently originated in the other branch of the National Legislature, and which came down to the House of Representatives, under circumstances which insured to them an earlier decision than would have followed a report from your committee. They beg leave, however, to remark, that the beneficial effect to be expected from any improvement of the pre-existing laws, in relation to the former species of traffic, which commences its enterprise against humanity, on a foreign and remote coast, and matures it on that of America, in such a manner as to elude detection by ordinary vigilance, must depend on the efforts of another branch of the Government.

It does not become your committee to do more, in relation to this branch of the inquiry charged upon them, than to intimate their opinion, that no act of legislation whatever would be so likely to put down this iniquitous traffic, as the multiplication of the revenue cutters upon the American shores, most frequented by the vessels engaged in it; and the employment of such part of the Navy, as would be best adapted to such service, in occasional visits to the African coast, at the season when it is frequented by the same description of vessels.

Your committee ask, therefore, to be discharged from the farther consideration of the second and third resolutions, to which they have referred, and beg leave to recommend to the House, in relation to the first, the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be and he is hereby requested to take such measures as he may deem proper, to ascertain whether a suitable territory can be procured on the coast of Africa, for colonizing such of the free people of the United States as may be willing to avail themselves of such an asylum; and to enter into such negotiation with the native tribes of Africa, or with one or more of the Governments of Europe, as may be necessary to obtain such territory, and to secure to the contemplated colony every advantage which he may deem essential to its future independence and prosperity."

The following are the resolutions of the Legislature of Virginia, in 1816, on the same subject:

"Whereas, the General Assembly of Virginia have repeatedly sought to obtain an asylum, beyond the limits of the United States, for such persons of color as had been, or might be emancipated, under the laws of the Commonwealth, but have hitherto found all their efforts frustrated, either by the disturbed state of the nations, or domestic causes equally unpropitious to their success.

"They now avail themselves of a period when peace has healed the wounds of humanity, and the principal nations of Europe have concurred with the Government of the United States in abolishing the African slave trade, (a traffic which this Commonwealth, both before and since the Revolution, zealously sought to terminate) to renew this effort, and do, therefore.

Resolve, That the Executive be requested to correspond with the President of the United States, for the purpose of obtaining a territory upon the coast of Africa, or at some other place, not within any of the States or territorial governments of the United States to serve as an asylum for such persons of color as are now free, and may desire the same, and for those who may be hereafter emancipated within this Commonwealth; and that the Senators and Representatives of this State, in the Congress of the United States, be requested to use their best efforts to aid the President of the United States in the attainment of the above object: Provided, That no contract or arrangement, respecting such territory, shall be obligatory on this Commonwealth, until ratified by the Legislature."

[Passed by the House of Delegates, December 15, 1816. By the Senate, with an amendment, December 20, 1816. Concurred in by the House of Delegates, December 21, 1816.]

SENATE BILLS, &amp;c.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing a subscription for the Statistical Annals of Adam Seybert, and the purchase of Pitkin's Commercial Statistics," was read the third time, and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of B. and P. Jourdan, brothers; and on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Samuel F. Hooker." The first named bill was reported with an amendment; which was read, and concurred in by the House, and the bill ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-day; which was accordingly done, and the bill passed.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of Samuel F. Hooker, was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. BLOOMFIELD moved, that when the House adjourn, it adjourn to to-morrow, (Sunday,) ten o'clock; but subsequently, after some opposition, withdrew his motion.

Mr. MERCER, after expressing his disapprobation of a Sabbath meeting of the House, moved that it meet at six o'clock, on Monday morning. This was negatived—ayes 44.

Mr. PINDALL moved, that when the House adjourn, it be to eight o'clock, on Monday morning.—Negatived.

Mr. HARRISON rose to renew the motion to meet to-morrow; but the motion was considered inadmissible by the Chair; as the hour for the orders of the day had arrived; to which the House then proceeded.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on bills from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Richard M. Johnson;" and "An act for the relief of John Hall, late a Major of Marines;" and on the bill of this House for transferring the claims in the office of the Commissioner to the Third Auditor of the Treasury. The bills were reported without amendment.

A motion was made by Mr. CLAIBORNE, to amend the first mentioned bill, when the House adjourned to Monday, at 10 o'clock.

MONDAY, April 20.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of this House of the following titles, to wit: An act respecting the organization of the Army, and for other purposes; An act to incorporate the Columbian Institute; An act to increase the duties on iron in bars and bolts, iron in pigs, castings, nails, and alum; An act for the relief of certain friendly Creek Indians of the mixed blood; An act for the relief of Captain Benjamin Johnson and Captain Henry Gist; An act to increase the duties on certain manufactured articles imported into the United States; An act to continue in force from and after the 30th of June, 1819, until the 30th of June, 1826, the fourth paragraph of the first section of the act, entitled "An act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage;" An act providing for the deposit of wines and distilled spirits in public warehouses; with amendments in which they ask the concurrence of this House. The Senate disagree to that part of the amendments proposed by this House to the bill, entitled "An act to increase the salaries of certain officers of Government," which proposes to increase the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, and they agree to the residue of the amendments of this House to the said bill, with a modification, in which they also ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the eight bills aforesaid, were read and severally concurred in by the House.

The amendments of the Senate to the amendments of this House to the bill to increase the salaries of certain officers of the Government having been taken up, a motion was made by Mr. BUTLER to postpone the whole subject indefinitely, and decided in the negative—yeas 39, nays 56.

On the question to concur in the amendment of the Senate, going to substitute 6,000 for 5,500, as the salary of the heads of departments, it was decided in the negative, by a majority of six votes.

The House then determined to insist on its amendment (disagreed to by the Senate) for increasing the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States.

On motion of Mr. INGHAM, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to report to Congress, at their next session, what further improvement it may be practicable to make in the tariff of duties upon imported goods, wares, and merchandise, by charging specific duties upon articles which are now charged with duties ad valorem.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Connecticut, the Secretary of War was directed, at an early period of the next session, to report to this House the names and places of residence of the several persons placed upon the pension list, under the act of this session, providing for persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the Revolutionary war, and the sum allowed to each.

On motion of Mr. MOORE, the Secretary of War was directed, at an early period of the next session, to report to this House the number and grades of the officers of the present Army, where stationed, the number on duty, and those on furlough, and the period of their furloughs.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Richard M. Johnson," and the amendment depending on Saturday, at the time of adjournment, was read and rejected by the House; and the bill ordered to be read a third time to-day, which was done, and the bill passed.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of John Hall, late a major of marines," was also ordered to be read a third time to-day; which was done, and the bill passed.

The bill for transferring the claims in the office of the Commissioner to the Third Auditor of the Treasury was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-day. It was subsequently read a third time, and passed.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS—PENNSYLVANIA.

The bill from the Senate to divide the State of Pennsylvania into two judicial districts, being called, in the order of the day—

Mr. HOPKINSON moved that the bill be postponed indefinitely, which motion was opposed by Messrs. BALDWIN, INGHAM, and MOORE, and advocated by the mover, and negatived by a large majority.

The House then went into Committee on the bill, when a debate of some length took place on the expediency of the measure, in which it was earnestly opposed by Mr. HOPKINSON, and as earnestly supported by Mr. BALDWIN.

Mr. FORSYTH, referring to the resolutions of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, requesting of Congress the passage of this bill, said he thought they asked nothing more than what was reasonable and proper; but, thinking that the object might be sufficiently attained in a way somewhat different, much less objectionable, and more expedient, moved, by way of amendment, a substitute for the bill, providing, substantially, that the circuit court of Pennsylvania be holden alternately at Philadelphia and Pittsburg.—Negatived.

Mr. HOPKINSON, after some remarks, to show, that there was nothing in the duties of the additional judge, provided by the bill, to entitle him, in justice, to equal salary with the present judge, moved that, instead of $1,600, as proposed, he be allowed a salary of $1000. This motion was lost by a large majority; and the bill was then reported, without amendment, and read the third time, and passed.

the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to vest in trust certain sections of land in the Legislature of the State of Ohio;" and after some time spent therein, Mr. SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and Mr. HUGH NELSON reported the same without amendment.

Ordered, That the said bill lie on the table.

The bill was reported without amendment, read a third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment proposed by this House to the bill, entitled "An act to increase the salaries of certain officers of Government," which increases the salary of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, and they insist on their modifications to the residue of the amendments of this House to the said bill, so far as regards the salaries of the Secretaries of State and Treasury. And they have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act supplementary to an act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," passed the 2d day of March, 1799; An act for the relief of Jonathan D. Esary and John Seybold; and An act for the relief of James Mackey, of the Territory of Missouri; with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the three bills aforesaid, were read, and severally concurred in by the House.

The House took up, and proceeded to consider the message from the Senate, notifying, that they insist on their modifications to the amendments of this House, to the bill, entitled "An act to increase the salaries of certain officers of the Government," so far as regards the salaries of the Secretaries of State and Treasury: when—

Mr. LOWNDES, after expressing his objection to sanctioning any longer the discrimination which had heretofore existed in the salaries of the Heads of Departments, now that the House was called upon to legislate on the subject, moved that the House adhere to its disagreement to the Senate's amendment to the clause fixing the salaries of the Heads of Departments.

This motion was supported by Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, upon similar grounds; and, after an unsuccessful motion, by Mr. STROTHER, to lay the bill on the table, and one by Mr. RICH, to postpone it indefinitely—

Mr. LOWNDES's motion was agreed to, and the Senate informed thereof.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to the House of Representatives a copy of the rules, regulations, and instructions, for the naval service of the United States, prepared by the Board of Navy Commissioners, in obedience to an act of Congress, passed the 7th of February, 1815, entitled "An act to alter and amend the several acts for establishing a Navy Department, by adding thereto a Board of Commissioners."

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, April 20, 1818.

The Message was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A motion was made by Mr. PINDALL, that the House do now proceed to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill entitled "An act to provide for delivering up persons held to labor or service in any of the States or Territories of the United States, who shall escape into any other State or Territory."

And the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

The House adjourned until six o'clock, P. M.

SIX O'CLOCK, P. M.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have postponed until Monday next, the bill entitled "An act to increase the salaries of certain officers of the Government." They have also postponed, until the same day, the bill, entitled "An act to suspend the sales of certain lands in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri;" and, "An act for the relief of John Anderson." And they have passed bills of this House of the following titles, to wit: An act for changing the compensation of receivers and registers of the land offices; and, An act to regulate and fix the compensation of clerks in the different offices; with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The said amendments were read and severally concurred in by the House.

The following resolution was submitted by Mr. WILKIN, viz:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of two hundred dollars, directed by a resolution of Congress of the 3d of November, 1780, to be paid to John Paulding, one of the virtuous and patriotic captors of Major Andre, Adjutant General of the British army, on his return from the American lines in the character of a spy, in the Revolutionary war, be continued and paid to the widow and minor children of the said John Paulding, or to the survivor or survivors of them, for five years, from the 19th of February, 1818, to be paid to them half yearly.

The resolution having been read, it was, on motion of Mr. WILKIN, laid on the table, who observed that the members, having their attention brought to the subject, could bring with them at the next session the public sentiment respecting this appropriation for the children of the patriotic Paulding.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Connecticut, the Committee of the Whole was discharged from the further consideration of the report of the select committee respecting the expenses incurred under the 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th articles of the Treaty of Ghent, and the House then proceeded to consider said report, which concludes with recommending the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to arrange with the British Government some mode of designating the boundary line under the 6th and 7th articles of the Treaty of Ghent, which shall require less time and expense than the one which the Commissioners have heretofore pursued.

After some debate, in which Messrs. WILLIAMS, of Connecticut, and PITKIN advocated the adoption of the resolution, and Mr. OGDEN opposed it, the question was decided in the affirmative, and the resolution agreed to.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting statements in relation to the progress, &c., in the construction of the Cumberland road, in obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 14th instant.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to alter and establish post roads," with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The said amendments were read, and concurred in by the House, except the last, to which they disagreed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him of the approaching recess of Congress; and have appointed a committee on their part.

The House took up the said resolution, and being read, it was concurred in by the House; and Mr. HARRISON and Mr. PITKIN were appointed a committee, conformably thereto, on the part of this House.

The said committee having reported that the President had no further communication to make to Congress, the SPEAKER adjourned the House until the third Monday in November next, the day fixed by law for the next meeting of the Congress of the United States.

[FIRST SESSION.]

COMPRISING THE MOST IMPORTANT DOCUMENTS ORIGINATING DURING THAT CONGRESS, AND THE PUBLIC ACTS PASSED BY IT.

SUPPRESSION OF PIRATICAL ESTABLISHMENTS.

[Reported to the House, January 10, 1818.]

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred so much of the President's Message as relates to the illicit introduction of slaves from Amelia Island, having carefully taken the matter committed to them into consideration, respectfully report:

That, having applied to the Department of State for information respecting the illicit introduction of slaves into the United States, they were referred by the Secretary of State to the documents transmitted to this House by the President's Message of the 15th of December last, consisting of various extracts of papers on the files of the Departments of State, of the Treasury, and of the Navy, relative to the proceedings of certain persons who took possession of Amelia Island in the Summer of the past year, and also relative to a similar establishment previously made at Galveston, near the mouth of the river Trinity.

Upon a full investigation of these papers, with a view to the subject committed to them, your committee are of opinion that it is but too notorious that numerous infractions of the law prohibiting the importation of slaves into the United States have been perpetrated with impunity upon our Southern frontier; and they are further of opinion that similar infractions would have been repeated, with increasing activity, without the timely interposition of the naval force, under the direction of the Executive of our Government.

In the course of their investigation, your committee have found it difficult to keep separate the special matter given into their charge from topics of a more general nature, which are necessarily interwoven therewith; they therefore crave the indulgence of the House while they present some general views connected with the subject, which have developed themselves in the prosecution of their inquiry.

It would appear, from what can be collected from these papers, that numerous violations of our laws have been latterly committed by a combination of freebooters and smugglers of various nations, who located themselves, in the first instance, upon an uninhabited spot, near the mouth of the river Trinity, within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, as claimed in virtue of the treaty of cession of Louisiana by France. This association of persons organized a system of plunder upon the high seas, directed chiefly against Spanish property, which consisted frequently of slaves from the coast of Africa; but their conduct appears not always to have been regulated by a strict regard to the national character of vessels falling into their hands, when specie, or other valuable articles, formed part of the cargo. Their vessels generally sailed under a pretended Mexican flag, although it does not appear that the establishment at Galveston was sanctioned by, or connected with, any other Government. The presumption, too, of any authority ever having been given for such an establishment is strongly repelled, as well by its piratical character, as its itinerant nature; for the first position at Galveston was abandoned on or about the 5th of April last, for one near Matagorda, upon the Spanish territory; and at a later period, this last was abandoned and a transfer made to Amelia Island, in East Florida, a post which had been previously seized by persons who appear to have been equally unauthorized, and who were, at the time of the said transfer, upon the point, it is believed, of abandoning their enterprise, from the failure of resources, which they expected to have drawn from within our limits, in defiance of our laws. There exists on the part of these sea rovers an organized system of daring enterprise, supported by force of arms; and it is only by a correspondent system of coercion that they can be met, and constrained to respect the rights of property and the laws of nations. It is deeply to be regretted that practices of such a character, within our immediate neighborhood, and even within our jurisdictional limits, should have prevailed unchecked for so long a time; the more especially as one of their immediate consequences was to give occasion to the illicit introduction of slaves from the coast of Africa into these United States, and thus to revive a traffic repugnant to humanity, and to all sound principles of policy, as well as severely punishable by the laws of the land.

By the seventh section of the act prohibiting the importation of slaves, passed in 1807, the President is fully authorized to employ the naval force to cruise on any part of the United States, or territories thereof, where he may judge attempts will be made to violate the provisions of that act, in order to seize and bring in for condemnation all vessels contravening its provisions, to be proceeded against according to law.

By the joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives, of the 15th of January, 1811, and the act of the same date, the President is fully empowered to occupy any part or the whole of the territory lying east of the river Perdido, and south of the State of Georgia, in the event of an attempt to occupy the said territory, or any part thereof, by any foreign Government or Power; and by the same resolution and act he may employ any part of the Army and Navy of the United States which he may deem necessary for the purpose of taking possession of and occupying the territory aforesaid, and in order to maintain therein the authority of the United States.

Among the avowed projects of the persons who have occupied Amelia Island was that of making the conquest of East and West Florida, professedly for the purpose of establishing there an independent Government; and the vacant lands in those provinces have been, from the origin of this undertaking down to the latest period, held out as lures to the cupidity of adventurers, and as resources for defraying the expenses of the expedition. The greater part of West Florida being in actual possession of the United States, this project involved in it designs of direct hostility against them; and, as the express object of the resolution and act of January 15, 1811, was to authorize the President to prevent the province of East Florida from passing into the hands of any foreign Power, it became the obvious duty of the President to exercise the authority vested in him by that law. It does not appear that among these itinerant establishments of republics and distributors of Florida lands there is a single individual inhabitant of the country where the republic was to be constituted, and whose lands were to be thus bestowed. The project was, therefore, an attempt to occupy that territory by a foreign Power. Where the profession is in such direct opposition to the fact; where the venerable forms by which a free people constitute a frame of government for themselves are prostituted by a horde of foreign freebooters for purposes of plunder; if, under color of authority from any of the provinces contending for their independence, the Floridas, or either of them, had been permitted to pass into the hands of such a Power, the committee are persuaded it is quite unnecessary to point out to the discernment of the House the pernicious influence which such a destiny of the territories in question must have had upon the security, tranquillity, and commerce of this Union.

It is a matter of public notoriety, that two of the persons who have successively held the command at Amelia Island, whether authorized themselves by any Government or not, have issued commissions for privateers, as in the name of the Venezuelan and Mexican Governments, to vessels fitted out in the ports of the United States, and chiefly manned and officered by our own countrymen, for the purpose of capturing the property of nations with which the United States are at peace. One of the objects of the occupation of Amelia Island, it appears, was to possess a convenient resort for privateers of this description, equally reprobated by the laws of nations, which recognise them only under the denomination of pirates, and by several of the treaties of the United States with different European Powers, which expressly denominate them as such.* It was against the subjects of Spain, one of the Powers with which the United States have entered into stipulations prohibiting their citizens from taking any commission from any Power with which she may be at war, for arming any ships to act as privateers, that these vessels have been commissioned to cruise; though, as the committee have observed, no flag, not even that of our own country, has proved a protection from them.

The immediate tendency of suffering such armaments, in defiance of our laws, would have been to embroil the United States with all the nations whose commerce with our country was suffering under these depredations, and if not checked by all the means in the power of the Government would have authorized claims from the subjects of foreign Governments for indemnities at the expense of this nation, for captures by our people in vessels fitted out in our ports, and, as could not fail of being alleged, countenanced by the very neglect of the necessary means of suppressing them.

The possession of Amelia Island, as a port of refuge for such privateers, and of illicit traffic in the United States of their prizes, which were frequently, as before stated, slave ships from Africa, was a powerful encouragement and temptation to multiply these violations of our laws, and made it the duty of the Government to use all the means in its power to restore the security of our own commerce, and of that of friendly nations upon our coasts, which could in no other way more effectually be done than by taking from this piratical and smuggling combination their place of refuge.

In order, therefore, to give full effect to the intentions of the Legislature, and in pursuance of the provisions of the above-recited resolution and acts, it became necessary, as it appears to the committee, to suppress all establishments of the hostile nature of those above described, made in our vicinity, the objects of which appear to have been the occupation of the Floridas, the spoliation of peaceful commerce upon and near our coasts by piratical privateers, the clandestine importation of goods, and the illicit introduction of slaves within our limits. Such establishments, if suffered to subsist and strengthen, would probably have rendered nugatory all provisions made by law for the exclusion of prohibited persons. The course pursued on this occasion will strongly mark the feelings and intentions of our Government upon the great question of the slave trade, which is so justly considered by most civilized nations as repugnant to justice and humanity, and which, in our particular case, is not less so to all the dictates of a sound policy.

* See the Treaty of Peace with France, 1778, art. 21, United States Laws, vol. 1, p. 88; with the Netherlands, 1782, art. 19, vol. 1, p. 162; with Sweden, 1783, art. 23, vol. 1, p. 190; with Great Britain, 1794, art. 21, vol. 1, p. 218; with Prussia, 1785, art. 20, vol. 1, p. 238, and 1797, art. 20, p. 256; with Spain, 1795, art. 14, vol. 1, p. 270.

Suppression of Piratical Establishments.

Your committee anticipate beneficial results from the adoption of these measures by the Executive, in the promotion of the security of our Southern frontier and its neighboring seas, and in the diminution of the evasions, latterly so frequent, of our revenue and prohibitory laws. The experience of ten years has, however, evinced the necessity of some new regulations being adopted, in order effectually to put a stop to the further introduction of slaves into the United States. In the act of Congress prohibiting this importation, the policy of giving the whole forfeiture of vessel and goods to the United States, and no part thereof to the informer, may justly be doubted. This is an oversight which should be remedied. The act does, indeed, give a part of the personal penalties to the informer, but these penalties are generally only nominal, as the persons engaged in such traffic are usually poor. The omission of the States to pass acts to meet the act of Congress, and to establish regulations in aid of the same, can only be remedied by Congress legislating directly upon the subject themselves, as it is clearly within the scope of their constitutional power to do.

[The following documents are extracted from those referred to in the foregoing report.]

Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Secretary of State, dated

NOVEMBER 21, 1817.

The Secretary of the Treasury presents his respects to the Secretary of State, and has the honor of transmitting to him copies of the communications which have been received at this Department concerning the occupation of Galveston and Amelia Island by persons sailing under the various flags of the independent Governments of North and South America, late Spanish provinces.

Extracts of a letter from Beverly Chew, Esq., collector at New Orleans, to Mr. Crawford, dated

AUGUST 1, 1817.

As it is your wish that every attempt to evade the provisions of the existing laws should be communicated to the Department, accompanied by suggestions of the measures necessary to repress the evil, I deem it my duty to state that the most shameful violations of the slave act, as well as our revenue laws, continue to be practised, with impunity, by a motley mixture of freebooters and smugglers, at Galveston, under the Mexican flag, and being, in reality, little else than the re-establishment of the Barrataria band, removed somewhat more out of the reach of justice; and, unless the officers of customs are provided with more effectual means for the enforcement of the laws, the Treasury must suffer incalculably. To give you a more correct idea of this establishment, it will be necessary to be a little prolix, which I beg you will excuse. Galveston is a small island or sandbar, situate in the bay of St. Bernard, on the coast of Texas, about ninety miles west of Sabine, within the jurisdictional limits claimed by the United States, in virtue of the cession of Louisiana to them by France. The establishment was recently made there by a Commodore Aury, with a few small schooners from Aux Cayes, manned, in a great measure, with refugees from Barrataria and mulattoes. This establishment was reinforced by a few more men from different points of the coast of Louisiana, the most efficient part of them being principally mariners, (Frenchmen or Italians,) who have been hanging loose upon society in and about New Orleans, in greater or smaller numbers, ever since the breaking up of the establishment at Barrataria. Colonel Perry commanded one party of about eighty or ninety men of this new community, who had been enlisted principally as soldiers within our jurisdiction; and Mr. Herarra, coming with a few followers from New Orleans, brought up the rear; and then announced the establishment to the world by a proclamation, attested by a Frenchman by the name of Morin, very recently a bankrupt auctioneer in New Orleans, as Secretary of State. From this new station, fed and drawing all its resources from New Orleans, and keeping up a regular intelligence, through a variety of channels, with their friends here, an active system of plunder was commenced on the high seas, chiefly of Spanish property, but often without much concern as to the national character, particularly when money was in question. The captures made by their numerous cruisers (many owned by citizens of the United States) were condemned by a pretended court of admiralty there as prizes, and the cargoes introduced into this State, principally in a clandestine manner. The vessels thus condemned have generally come here under new names, and with the Mexican flag. Some of them have been detained by the United States naval force for hovering in our waters, and others have been libelled for restitution by the Spanish Consul, in behalf of the original owners; and though several trials have come on before the honorable the United States district court for the district of Louisiana, and the claimants have never been able to produce proof of the Government of Galveston having ever been authorized by the Mexican Republic, restitution has been decreed in several instances. There is no evidence of the establishment having been made or sanctioned by, or connected with, a Mexican republic, if one be now existing; and the presumption of such an actual establishment under such an authority is strongly repelled by the illegal and practical character of the establishment, and its anulatory nature. It is not only of very recent origin, but is clothed with no character of permanency; for it was abandoned about the 5th of April, and transferred to Matagorda, leaving at Galveston only an advice boat, to advertise such privateers and prizes which might arrive there of the spot on which they had fixed their new residence. Some days after the abandonment of Galveston, several privateers arrived there, and among the rest the General Artigas, commanded by one G. Champlin, of New York, with two schooners, her prizes, the Patronila, with one hundred and seventy-four slaves, and the Ebrequita, with one hundred and thirteen slaves, and also a Spanish and a Portuguese vessel, and the American schooner Evening Post, of New York, Calvin Williams master, prizes to the —, Captain Maurice Nicholas Jolly.

Among the most conspicuous characters who happened to be then at Galveston were many of the notorious offenders against our laws who had so lately been indulged with a remission of the punishment, who, so far from gratefully availing themselves of the lenity of the Government to return to or commence an orderly and honest life, seem to have regarded its indulgence almost as an encouragement to a renewal of their offences. You will readily perceive I allude to the Barraterians, among whom the Lafittes may be classed foremost, and most actively engaged in the Galveston trade, and owners of several cruises under the Mexican flag. Many of our citizens are equally guilty, and are universally known to be owners of the same kind of vessels. A number of these characters being at Galveston after the abandonment, readily saw the advantages that would result in the re-establishment of a Government at that place; its situation, so immediately in the vicinity of our settlements, being much preferable to Matagorda; their views being entirely confined to introducing their captures into this State. Accordingly, a meeting was called on the 15th of April, and it was resolved to re-establish the Government; and a true copy of their deliberations you have enclosed. I can vouch for the correctness of the copy, having received it from a person of undoubted veracity. And thus, without even the semblance of authority from the Mexican Republic, they immediately proceeded to condemn vessels and cargoes as good prizes, and to introduce them into this port, and, among the rest, the cargo of the Evening Post. It was some time before this was known here, great pains having been taken to keep it secret. Since it has been known, I have felt it my duty to report all vessels and cargoes which have arrived here from Galveston to the district attorney, who has had them arrested under the Spanish Treaty; but, owing to the unfortunate absence of the judge, no decision can be had thereon. These steps of the officers of the port have irritated the Barratarian gentlemen and their connexions in a high degree; and representations filled with falsehoods will probably be made against them, particularly on the score of enmity to the patriotic cause. As well might a man be accused of being an enemy to personal liberty who arrests and confines a robber, as that the officers of the port of New Orleans should be accused of being unfriendly to the revolution in the Spanish provinces because they attempted to prevent a lawless establishment at Galveston from violating the laws. The prizes made by the privateers under the Mexican flag are to a very large amount of merchandise, such as jewelry, laces, silks, linens, britannias, muslins, seersuckers, calicoes, &c.; all of which are repacked in small bales, of convenient size for transportation on mules, and the greatest part introduced clandestinely. Other articles, such as iron, nails, tallow, leather, glass ware, crockery, cordage, beef, &c., are brought here in their prizes. It is stated, and universally believed, that Captain Champlin sold the slaves captured in the Patronila and Enrequita to the Lafittes, Sauvinet, and other speculators in this place, who have or will resell to the planters; and the facility offered to smugglers by the innumerable inlets are too obvious, on a view of the map, to doubt; but they either are or will be all introduced into this State, without the possibility of the officers of the revenue being able to prevent or punish them; more especially as a great portion of the population are disposed to countenance them in violating our laws. A few days ago, information having been given that one of our citizens had gone to the W. with a very considerable sum in specie, to purchase slaves for himself and two other planters, I determined to make an effort to arrest him on his return, and immediately purchased a fine boat on account of the Government, (which had been lately captured by a party I had sent on Lake Ponchartrain, and condemned for a violation of the slave act,) which I have sent under the command of an active, enterprising inspector, with a military guard of twelve men, and am in great hopes of his falling in with and capturing the party. I am persuaded you will approve of my not waiting for instructions, at the risk of seeing the laws violated with impunity; and I cannot but hope the Government will see the necessity of giving instructions to the naval force on this station to prevent the re-establishment of Galveston; otherwise the bay will no longer be safe for any flag. Since they have been denied shelter in Port au Prince, they have no other asylum than Galveston. On the part of these pirates we have to contend with, we behold an extended and organized system of enterprise, of ingenuity, of indefatigability, and of audacity, favored by a variety of local advantages, and supported always by force of arms; and, unless they be met by correspondent species of resistance, the results of the contest are of very simple calculation.

You will, I trust, see the necessity of either granting a certain number of revenue cutters, of the description I have mentioned, or that the naval force on this station may be enjoined strictly to prevent these privateers from hovering in our waters and violating our laws. It is a fact you may rely on, all the cruises of these privateers commence and end at this port; they enter in distress, comply with the formalities of the law, and if they do not augment their force and renew their crews in port, they do it in our waters, and it is not in my power to prevent it.

Mr. Chew, Collector at New Orleans, to Mr. Crawford.
August 30, 1817.

SIR: In the communication which I had the honor to make you, under date of the 1st instant, I gave such information respecting the establishment at Galveston as I had collected; since then, the depositions of Mr. J. Ducoing and V. Carros, (ex-judges of admiralty at that place, and now, here,) have been taken; and I herewith transmit you copies, which go to substantiate the material fact stated by me, and I make no doubt but you will be satisfied of the correctness of the assertion, that the establishment of Galveston is nothing more or less than one of privateersmen, without even the shadow of a connexion with a Mexican republic, (if such a republic exists,) and, as such, will not, I presume, be countenanced by the Government of the United States. It has been reported to me, and from a source deserving credit, that the principal part of the force from Matagorda and Soto de la Marina had returned to Galveston, and that two prizes with slaves had recently arrived—one a schooner with a full cargo, said to be three hundred, (probably exaggerated;) that a contagious fever having made its appearance among the slaves, the privateersmen, apprehensive of its communicating to the other prize, cut the cables and sent the schooner adrift with the unfortunate beings on board. The other prize, a ship with four hundred slaves, was lying there; and they have, altogether, about six hundred and fifty slaves on hand, all of whom are intended to be introduced into this State.

The United States brig Boxer has sent in two small schooners, with thirty slaves on board, captured in our waters; and the deputy collector of the district of Teche writes me that he has seized fifteen, and was in pursuit of a larger number. At this moment I have sent two confidential inspectors to examine three plantations on this river, near Baton Rouge, information having been given me that one hundred had been purchased for the three at Galveston. This activity had occasioned some alarm, and I am informed, (and place complete confidence in it,) that the privateersmen, and others interested, have resolved to remove the slaves to the neighborhood of the Sabine, build barracks, and keep them there during the winter, or till the purchasers appear, and leave the risk of introducing the slaves to the planters, whose eagerness to procure them will induce them to run every hazard. They imagine that, fixing themselves to the west of the Sabine, they will be without the jurisdiction of the United States; but I trust they will find their mistake only when the whole party will be seized.

In addition to the foregoing, I beg leave to refer you to the documents lately forwarded by Commodore Patterson to the honorable Secretary of the Navy, with the memorial of the most respectable merchants of this place, praying him to furnish convoy to protect their vessels trading with the Spanish ports from the piratical cruisers, who respect no flag when specie is in question.

I have lately sent an inspector of confidence to examine La Fouché, from the Mississippi to the sea, and he reports it as thickly settled for eighty miles from the river; has eight to ten feet water, and six feet on the bar at the mouth, or entrance into the sea. There is no obstacle whatever to craft entering it from the sea, and ascending to the Mississippi, and trading freely as high up as they please. I mentioned in my last the necessity of appointing an inspector for that place, if you decide not to have revenue cutters on this station. I cannot but repeat, that I am firmly persuaded the measure is more necessary for this than any other district in the United States. Bartholomew Lafon, of this place, who acted as secretary to the meeting of the 15th April, (copy of deliberation forwarded in my last,) is mentioned as the Governor of the new establishment near the Sabine. Lafite is now purchasing a large quantity of provisions, and the first cargo will soon sail; a copy of the manifest will accompany this, or soon follow. These persons, and a long list of others I could add if necessary, have no other profession, occupation, or mode of livelihood, than privateering and violating our laws, and openly threaten revenge against any officer of the revenue that may molest or impede their pursuits. They are now preparing a memorial to the Department, with the double view to misrepresent the conduct of the officers of the port, and to obtain permission to introduce their illegally-captured property, under the false pretext that they (the memorialists) have made heavy advances; the truth is, the only advances they allude to is the equipment and fitting out privateers, contrary to our laws. The exports from this place to Galveston and Matagorda have consisted principally of provisions; a cargo of arms was sent some time in the fall of last year, which has long since been given up as lost, and no return whatever can ever be expected from the Mexican Government, from all present appearances. The imports (without taking into consideration the large amount of goods introduced clandestinely) have been very large, as you will observe by the enclosed abstract of duties secured at this office on these importations.

I have felt it my duty to give you this information for your correct understanding the nature of the establishment at Galveston, and cannot but hope you will be pleased to instruct me implicitly how to act. My conduct has been governed by a sense of duty, and from a conviction of its propriety; if I have erred, I hope it will be ascribed to an honest zeal. I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

BEVERLY CHEW.

OCTOBER 17, 1817.

Sir: My communications of the 1st and 30th of August last, relative to the establishment at Galveston, and the numerous cruisers under the Mexican flag that infest our waters, will, I trust, have reached your hands. I deem it my duty to trouble you once more upon the same subject, and to enclose copies of additional testimony of Mr. John Ducoing, late Judge of Admiralty, and of Mr. Raymond Espagnol, late Secretary of State, which will, I trust, satisfactorily prove my assurances of the piratical nature of the establishment, and justify, in your opinion, the officers of this port in the steps taken by them to put an end to it; for such, it appears, has been the effect of the measures adopted here. Late advices from that place state that Aury and Champlin, with their privateers, and prizes (said to be thirteen sail) evacuated the place, and, it is believed, they have steered their course for Amelia Island. Before their departure they disposed of about three hundred Africans to the agents of some planters on the river; the remainder they have taken with them. The deputy collector of the district of Teche writes me that a large gang of Africans passed near the church of Attacapas on the night of the 14th ultimo, bound for the Mississippi. He heard of it too late to seize them. I have sent a confidential agent to watch the plantations of Joseph Erwin, James Still, and Christopher Adams; it being reported that the latter had been to Galveston to purchase slaves for himself and the others. I received, a few days ago, a letter from the person called Commodore Aury, dated at sea, 31st July last, on board the privateer Mexican Congress, (late Calypso, of Baltimore,) enclosing a duplicate of a letter which, it appears, he had thought proper to write me on the 28th of the same month, (the original of which has never come to hand.) In this letter he gives me a kind of official information that it has been determined to abandon Galveston, and that he had taken with him the Judge of the Admiralty, the collector, and all his other constituted authorities; and that whatever may be done at the place, after that date, will be without his approbation or consent, and any clearances, or other official acts, at that place illegal. I have no doubt, however, but that a new establishment will soon be made there. The advantages are too great to be voluntarily abandoned by persons who have so long enjoyed the profits. Early in September, two vessels, the Carmelite, belonging to B. Lafon, and the Franklin, belonging to J. B. Laforte, (both unregistered vessels, formerly prizes,) cleared at this office for Laguna, but really bound to Galveston, with provisions and materials for erecting buildings. On their arrival they found the place deserted, and the Franklin has returned to this port with her outward cargo. By her accounts have been received that the Carmelite was lying there, and that Lafitte (who had been pardoned for the crimes committed at Barrataria) and Lafon had arrived there, with about forty other persons, and, it is believed, intended to form an establishment, and will, no doubt, soon replace the judge and other authorities carried off by Aury. Private armed vessels, under the Mexican flag, and one or two under that of Venezuela, continued to frequent this port, and uniformly report in distress, (one case only excepted,) make protest, and obtain a certificate from the wardens of the port that there is necessity to unlade their armament and heave down. They have been thus admitted to an entry, free of any charge other than fees to the officers of the customs, under the sixtieth section of the collection law. This course seems to have been adopted by my predecessor, and has been followed by me, in compliance with the instructions from the Department of the 3d July, 1815. These armed vessels being admitted, great care has been taken not to permit any violation of the acts of 5th June, 1794, and 3d March last, by augmenting their force or enlisting American citizens; but, in defiance of every vigilance on the part of the officers of the customs, they violate the law, not whilst they remain in port, but before they leave our waters. Nothing is easier, when the privateer is completely repaired and ready for sea, than to send both men and guns, if they need them, to Barrataria, or any other convenient place, which the privateer repairs to, and takes them on board, and sails on a cruise with an augmented force, to commit hostilities against the persons and property of a nation with whom the United States are at peace.

It is universally reported, and believed, that many of these vessels (under the Mexican flag, and commissioned by Aury) are owned by persons resident here, and enjoying the privileges of American citizens. At the end of the cruise the same farce is played over again; and it may with truth be said that each cruise commences and ends at this port. Attempts have been made to convict them, but as yet without success. They easily exculpate themselves. Witnesses, on their part, are never difficult to be procured in a place where there are a vast number of people with whom the solemnity of an oath has little weight. This you will believe when I add that two witnesses were produced in the United States district court, in the month of May last, who swore that Galveston was a considerable and well-built town, with coffee-houses, shops, &c., and that the then constituted authorities (Durier, Ducoing, Espagnol, &c.) had been appointed and commissioned by Aury. The testimony of the two latter, as well as many other persons now here, will fully refute that falsehood.

I hope you will be pleased to give me some instructions relative to the cruisers, that I may act in a way to meet the views of the Executive.

I have the honor to be, &c.

BEVERLY CHEW.

To the Hon. Dominic A. Hall, judge of the district court of the United States in and for the district of Louisiana:

The petition of Beverly Chew, collector of the district of Mississippi, and one of the officers of the port of New Orleans, respectfully sheweth the facts set forth in the annexed affidavit, and prays an order pursuant thereto, commissioning some judge or justice of the peace in the city of New Orleans to take the depositions of the said witnesses in the said cause, at such time and place as to your honor shall seem meet.

And, as in duty bound, &c.

BEVERLY CHEW.

Signed and sworn to before me, this 6th day of October, 1817.

The United States District Court, Louisiana district:

The United States, in behalf, &c., vs. cargoes of Juana, Eliza, Carmelita, and Diana.

The same, vs. brigs Diana and Juana, schooners Eliza and Carmelita.

The same, vs. ninety boxes sugar.

The same, vs. sundry goods, &c., part of schr. Mount Vernon's cargo.

City of New Orleans, to wit:

Beverly Chew, collector, one of the officers of the port of New Orleans, being duly sworn, deposes and says: That Raymond Espagnol and John Ducoing, as this deponent is advised and believes, are material witnesses on the part of the prosecution in the above cases, and without the benefit of whose testimony the trial on the said behalf cannot be safely proceeded in; that the said witnesses are, as this deponent is informed and believes, about permanently to depart the United States, and before, in the common course of proceeding, the said causes can be brought to trial; so that, unless a commission issue for taking the depositions of the said witnesses prior to their intended departure from the United States, as aforesaid, the prosecution, he apprehends and believes, will be deprived of the evidence of the said witnesses.

BEVERLY CHEW.

Additional testimony taken in sundry cases depending in the United States District Court for the Louisiana district, on behalf of the United States, against sundry vessels and cargoes from Galveston.

John Ducoing being duly sworn, the deponent further says: That the establishment at Galveston was composed, as before stated, by persons of various nations, and that the sole view and object of the persons comprising the said establishment was to capture Spanish vessels and property, without any idea of aiding the revolution in Mexico, or that of any other of the Spanish revolted colonies, as far as this deponent knows and believes. And the deponent says, that during the time he exercised the functions of judge at Galveston, he had no knowledge of or belief in the existence of a Mexican republic, or other Government, independent of the Spanish Government.

The deponent further says that the Government established on the 15th day of April had no connexion whatever with any other Government, State, or people; that Galveston stands on a small island, or rather a small sandbar, a few miles long and broad, and was a desert when taken possession of by Aury, known by the name of Snake island, without a port or harbor, and no buildings, except a few huts or cabins, probably three or four, made of boards and sails of vessels.

And further this deponent saith not.

JOHN DUCOING.

Mr. Raymond Espagnol, being duly sworn, says: That, on the 16th day of March last, this deponent went from this place to Galveston, in the province of Texas, in the brig Devorador, for the purpose of disposing of merchandise. Aury was acting as Governor. This deponent accepted of no office or employment under Aury, nor had he any acquaintance with him; never took any oath of allegiance to Aury; that, on the 5th of April last, Aury and General Mina abandoned Galveston, burned the huts and cabins there were standing, and left no person, authorized by them or otherwise, to form a Government. After their departure, to wit, on the 15th of April, 1817, the persons then at Galveston consisted of about thirty or forty in number, including sailors, &c., six of whom assembled on board of the schooner Carmelita, (belonging to Mr. Bartholomew Lafon, late of New Orleans, and engineer in the service of the United States,) to wit, Durier, John Ducoing, Pereneau, said B. Lafon, Rousselin, and this deponent, who formed the new Government. The proceedings were drawn up and signed by those present, by which certain persons aforesaid took upon themselves offices, namely:

Durier, governor; John Ducoing, judge of admiralty; this deponent, notary public and secretary; Pereneau, major du place; Rousselin, collector.

At the meeting on the 15th of April, there was no paper or document produced, authorizing the same, or giving them power to form a Government.

The deponent further says that the sole object and view of the persons comprising the establishment at Galveston was, as far as he knows and believes, to capture Spanish property under what they called the Mexican flag, but without an idea of aiding the revolution in Mexico, or that of any of the Spanish revolted colonies; and further, that during the time that this deponent acted as notary public and secretary to the new Government at Galveston, he had no knowledge or belief in the existence of a Mexican republic, or any Government in Mexico, independent of the Spanish authorities; further, the deponent says, that the new Government established at Galveston on the 15th of April, 1817, had no connexion whatever with any other nation, state, or people.

That Galveston stands on a small sandbar, a few miles long and broad, and was a desert when taken possession of by Aury, known by the name of Snake island; without a port or harbor, and no buildings, except three or four cabins, built of boards and sails of vessels.

Further, this deponent says, that some time in the month of May last, when some of the merchandise and vessels from Galveston were libelled by the Spanish Consul in behalf of the Spanish owners, application was made to this deponent to appear before the Honorable Judge Hall, and to prove that the authorities appointed by the meeting at Galveston, on the 5th of April last, were appointed and commissioned by Aury. This application was explicitly stated to be on behalf of those interested in the Galveston establishment, particularly of Mr. Bartholomew Lafon, and Mr. J. Bte. Laporte, the former of whom was known to be indebted to this deponent in a sum of ten or twelve thousand dollars; this deponent refused informing the person by whom the application had been made; that if the deponent appeared, he would tell the truth, and should prove that the persons forming the Government (after the 15th of April) were not named by Aury. This deponent was not summoned as a witness, though it was known he was in the city, and has continued since to reside here. The deponent says that this is the true reason why he was not summoned to appear before the judge at the time when Messrs. Rieur and Pereneau appeared.

Extract—Mr. McIntosh to Mr. Crawford.

THE REFUGE, NEAR JEFFERSON,
CAMDEN COUNTY, Oct. 30, 1817.

MY DEAR SIR: The last letter I had the honor to address you was on the 9th of August; shortly after which the public papers announced that you had left Washington on a visit to Georgia. A few weeks after, I thought it not imprudent to venture out to my swamp plantation on the Sotillo, and since have been very little at St. Mary's. Since General McGregor and the greater part of his officers (some of whom were men of respectable standing in the United States) have left Amelia Island, there has not been so much ingenuity made use of in misrepresenting the conduct and intentions of the invaders of East Florida; and the accounts which are published of them are, for the most part, generally correct. The present chief, Commodore Aury, got the command very much against the inclinations of Sheriff Hubbert and Colonel Irwin. When he arrived at Fernandina with his squadron of privateers and prizes, they were entirely without money. He declared "that if he gave them any aid, it must be on the condition of being made commander-in-chief; and that, as General McGregor never had any commission whatever, the flag of the Florida Republic must be struck, and that of the Mexican hoisted; and that Fernandina should be considered as a conquest of the Mexican Republic, (under which he was commissioned,) without its being necessary that any other part of the province of East Florida should be conquered." Hubbert and Irwin reluctantly agreed to the mortifying condition of resigning the command. They were never friendly with the Commodore, and endeavored, but in vain, to gain over by intrigue a part of his men. Their own party considerably increasing shortly after, they were several times on the point of coming to open war with Aury and his followers, and under the pretence that Aury's forces were composed chiefly of brigand negroes. A few days before Mr. Hubbert's death, (who was called Governor, without having any power,) Aury marched to his quarters with a body of armed men, and obliged him to make such concessions as drove him to an act of intemperance, which soon after terminated his existence.

Since the death of this gentleman there has been little or no disturbance among them. But it would appear as if the suspicions of the Frenchman did not die with Hubbert, as none of his privateers have yet left Fernandina.

The parties are designated as the American and French; and I have been assured, by individuals belonging to them both, that each is anxiously looking for reinforcements. Aury has a number of Frenchmen, who were, it is said, officers of Bonaparte. They find it their interest, as well as inclination, to support their countrymen. His great dependence, however, is on about one hundred and thirty brigand negroes, a set of desperate bloody dogs.

The American party, which is rather more numerous than the other, consists generally of American, English, and Irish sailors, but now has no declared leader. Irwin wants either spirit or popularity to assume that character. For my own part, I believe that, in point of morals, patriotism, and intentions, they are exactly on a par. Aury's blacks, however, make their neighborhood extremely dangerous to a population like ours; and I fear if they are not expelled from that place, some unhappy consequences may fall on our country. It is said that they have declared, that if they are in danger of being overpowered, they will call to their aid every negro within their reach. Indeed, I am told that the language of the slaves in Florida is already such as is extremely alarming. The patriots at Fernandina had, about ten days ago, an unexpected and strange reinforcement. Twenty half-pay British officers, by the way of Turk's Island, arrived at St. John's river, and, mistaking it for Amelia, a colonel and a couple of others were made prisoners by the Spaniards. The others got safe to Fernandina; but, finding that General Sir Gregor McGregor had abandoned it, they determined immediately on doing so too.

[The following Message and documents relating to this subject were communicated to Congress, January 13, 1818.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I have the satisfaction to inform Congress that the establishment at Amelia Island has been suppressed, and without the effusion of blood. The papers which explain this transaction I now lay before Congress.

By the suppression of this establishment, and of that of Galveston, which will soon follow, if it has not already ceased to exist, there is good cause to believe that the consummation of a project fraught with much injury to the United States has been prevented. When we consider the persons engaged in it, being adventurers from different countries, with very few, if any, of the native inhabitants of the Spanish colonies; the territory on which the establishments were made, one on a portion of that claimed by the United States westward of the Mississippi, the other on a part of East Florida, a province in negotiation between the United States and Spain; the claim of their leader, as announced by his proclamation on taking possession of Amelia Island, comprising the whole of both the Floridas, without excepting that part of West Florida which is incorporated with the State of Louisiana; their conduct while in the possession of the island, making it instrumental to every species of contraband, and in regard to slaves of the most odious and dangerous character, it may fairly be concluded that, if the enterprise had succeeded on the scale on which it was formed, much annoyance and injury would have resulted from it to the United States.

Other circumstances were thought to be no less deserving of attention. The institution of a Government by foreign adventurers in the island, distinct from the colonial governments of Buenos Ayres, Venezuela, or Mexico, pretending to sovereignty, and exercising its highest offices, particularly in granting commissions to privateers, were acts which could not fail to draw after them the most serious consequences. It was the duty of the Executive either to extend to this establishment all the advantages of that neutrality which the United States had proclaimed and have observed in favor of the colonies of Spain, who, by the strength of their own population and resources, had declared their independence, and were affording strong proof of their ability to maintain it, or of making the discrimination which circumstances required. Had the first course been pursued, we should not only have sanctioned all the unlawful claims and practices of this pretended Government in regard to the United States, but have countenanced a system of privateering in the Gulf of Mexico and elsewhere, the ill effects of which might, and probably would, have been deeply and very extensively felt. The path of duty was plain from the commencement, but it was painful to enter upon it while the obligation could be resisted. The law of 1811, lately published, and which it is therefore proper now to mention, was considered applicable to the case, from the moment that the proclamation of the chief of the enterprise was seen; and its obligation was daily increased by other considerations of high importance already mentioned, which were deemed sufficiently strong in themselves to dictate the course which has been pursued.

Early intimations having been received of the dangerous purposes of these adventurers, timely precautions were taken, by the establishment of a force near the St. Mary, to prevent their effect, or it is probable that it would have been more sensibly felt.

To such establishments, made so near to our settlements, in the expectation of deriving aid from them, it is particularly gratifying to find that very little encouragement was given.

The example so conspicuously displayed by our fellow-citizens that their sympathies cannot be perverted to improper purposes, but that a love of country, the influence of moral principles, and a respect for the laws, are predominant with them, is a sure pledge that all the very flattering anticipations which have been formed of the success of our institutions will be realized. This example has proved that, if our relations with foreign Powers are to be changed, it must be done by the constituted authorities, who alone, acting on a high responsibility, are competent to the purpose; and, until such change is thus made, that our fellow-citizens will respect the existing relations by a faithful adherence to the laws which secure them.

Believing that this enterprise, though undertaken by persons, some of whom may have held commissions from some of the colonies, was unauthorized by and unknown to the colonial governments, full confidence is entertained that it will be disclaimed by them, and that effectual measures will be taken to prevent the abuse of their authority, in all cases, to the injury of the United States.

For these injuries, especially those proceeding from Amelia Island, Spain would be responsible, if it were not manifest that, although committed in the latter instance through her territory, she was utterly unable to prevent them. Her territory, however, ought not to be made instrumental, through her inability to defend it, to purposes so injurious to the United States. To a country over which she fails to maintain her authority, and which she permits to be converted to the annoyance of her neighbors, her jurisdiction for the time necessarily ceases to exist. The territory of Spain will, nevertheless, be respected, so far as it may be done consistently with the essential interests and safety of the United States. In expelling these adventurers from these posts, it was not intended to make any conquest from Spain, or to injure, in any degree, the cause of the colonies. Care will be taken that no part of the territory contemplated by the law of 1811 shall be occupied by a foreign Government of any kind, or that injuries of the nature of those complained of shall be repeated; but this, it is expected, will be provided for, with every other interest, in a spirit of amity, in the negotiation now depending with the Government of Spain.

JAMES MONROE.

From the Secretary of War to the President of the United States.

JANUARY 12, 1818.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit copies of the orders which have been given by the acting Secretary of War to Major Bankhead, in relation to taking possession of Amelia Island, and copies of the communications which have been made to this department by that officer, which embrace all the information in my possession.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, OFF AMELIA.

December 22, 1817.

SIR: We have received orders from our Government to take possession of Amelia Island, and to occupy the port of Fernandina with a part of our force, which will be moved over as soon as it will be convenient for your troops to evacuate it.

To avoid unnecessary delay, we think proper at this time to inform you, in the event of your acquiescence in this demand, that you will be at liberty to depart with the forces under your command, and such property as belongs unquestionably to them will be held sacred:

You are to leave the public property found by General McGregor at Fernandina in the same condition it was taken, and the property of the inhabitants of Amelia Island must be restored to them, where they have been forcibly dispossessed of it; and no depredations on private property, from this period, will be permitted with impunity.

Should you, contrary to the expectations of the President of the United States, refuse to give us peaceable possession of the island, the consequences of resistance must rest with you.

We have the honor to be, &c.

J. D. HENLEY,
Commander-in-Chief U. S. naval forces, off Amelia.

JAMES BANKHEAD,
Major 1st Battalion U. S. Army.

General AURY,
Commander-in-Chief at Fernandina, &c.

HEADQUARTERS, FERNANDINA,
Amelia Island, Dec. 22, 1817.

GENTLEMEN: I have had the honor to receive your official letter of this day. The nature of its contents requiring mature deliberation, I have submitted the same to the Representatives of the Republic, and, as soon as I shall have obtained their opinion, it shall be immediately sent to you.

I can, however, state to you, gentlemen, that no opposition will be made to surrender the island of Amelia on the part of this Government.

I have the honor to remain, &c.

AURY, Commander-in-Chief.

Com. J. D. HENLEY, Major Bankhead, &c.

HEADQUARTERS, FERNANDINA,
Amelia Island, Dec. 22, 1817.

GENTLEMEN: I have received your official letter of this day, by which, in the name of the Government of the United States, you summon us to evacuate this place with the troops under my command, as possession thereof is to be taken by the forces under your commands, under certain conditions therein specified.

This Republic, that of Mexico, nor any other of South America, being at war with the United States, obliges me to state to you that the contents of your letter have greatly surprised this Government and the people of the State. You have, nevertheless, intimated that, in case of our acquiescence to your demand, we shall be permitted to evacuate this island, which never was nor ever has been a part of the United States. Allow me, gentlemen, to observe to you, that, from the moment we took Fernandina by the force of our arms, we entered into the full possession of all the rights appertaining to our enemy, and that to this day we have supported these rights at the risk of our lives and fortunes. The boundaries of the Floridas and the United States having been fairly settled by the Treaty of Friendship, Limits, and Navigation, on the 22d of October, 1795, leaves us at a loss to ascertain your authority to interfere in our internal concerns.

Our surprise increases when we reflect that your communication comes as authorized by the Government of a people who glory in their respect for the rights of nations, whether great or small, and who, no doubt, sympathize and wish success to their southern brethren in the struggle for liberty and independence in which they are engaged, as were the United States forty years ago.

On the other side, you promise to hold sacred such of our property as unquestionably belongs to our citizens. Who is to be the judge in this case? The United States, who can by no means claim any kind of jurisdiction from the source of the river St. Mary's down to the ocean, on this side of the centre of the channel. We entertain too much veneration for your Constitution to believe for a moment that you, supposed already in possession of this island, which has never been ceded by the King of Spain, or by its inhabitants, to the United States, can bring with you a competent tribunal to decide upon this question. The only law you can adduce in your favor is that of force, which is always repugnant to republican governments, and to the principles of a just and impartial nation. The same observation may be applied to your interference with the property of the inhabitants, which we have always respected and considered as sacred.

You order us, also, as if we were subjects of your Government, to leave behind, when Fernandina is evacuated, all the public property that was found at its surrender. This demand is directly contrary to the public rights by which all public property captured by the enemy is avowedly that of the captors, when not otherwise stipulated. Are you acting in the name of the King of Spain, or his allies? As we consider the people of the United States as unquestionably the only free people on the surface of the globe, we cannot admit that you have now become the adherents of a tyrant; otherwise, your demand is inadmissible and unjustifiable in the eyes of the world; and if we must yield to it, all the blame rests with you.

Permit me therefore, gentlemen, to request of you to lay before the President of the United States these remarks, in order that a matter of so serious a tendency may be reconsidered. We have read his Excellency's Message at the opening of Congress with the utmost concern, and I have concluded that the political situation of this Republic has been greatly misrepresented in the United States, through the intrigues of our enemies. We have certainly a right to be heard, for which purpose I shall have the honor of forwarding to your Government the necessary documents. If you are not disposed to let things remain in statu quo until the President's further determination be known, I am authorized to assure you that we respect and esteem too highly the people of the United States to carry matters to extremities. I have the honor to remain, &c.

AURY, Commander-in-Chief.

J. D. HENLEY, Esq., Capt. U. S. Navy.
JAMES BANKHEAD, Esq., Major Artillery, &c.

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS,
Off Amelia Island, Dec. 23, 1817.

SIR: We have had the honor to receive your communication of the 22d instant, and will briefly remark, that, as officers in the service of the United States, we are bound to obey the orders emanating from the authorities of our Government, without any discussion or animadversion on our part as to the correctness of them. We have been ordered by the President of the United States to take possession of Amelia Island, and as the President has expressed his solicitude that the effusion of blood may be avoided, if possible, it must be gratifying to us to be informed by you that no resistance will be made to us.

We will again remark, that private property will be sacred, and that our orders extend only to the public property captured by General McGregor at Fernandina.

We propose to land a force to-day, and to hoist the American flag; under that flag, no oppression or unjust measures will ever be witnessed. And we feel assured that there will be no difficulties in the arrangement made by us.

The squadron will immediately sail into the harbor, when the commanding officer of the land forces will wait on the commander-in-chief to make necessary arrangements for the landing of the troops. We have the honor to be, &c.

HEADQUARTERS, FERNANDINA,
Island of Amelia, Dec. 23, 1817.

I have had the honor to receive your letter of this date. I am ready to surrender this place to the forces under your command, whenever you may judge proper to come and take possession thereof. I have the honor to be, &c.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, July 17, 1817.

SIR: Circumstances having made it necessary to occupy, without delay, Point Petre and the St. Mary's river, by a military and naval force, I have to request that you will instruct the officer whom, in pursuance of the order issued through the Adjutant General, you may detail to command at Point Petre, to co-operate with the officer commanding the naval force on that station, in such measures as may be deemed necessary for the preservation of the peace and tranquillity of that section of the country, which there is reason to apprehend may be disturbed in consequence of the contest between the Spanish royalists and patriots for the occupation of the adjacent territory. The officer will also be instructed to use due vigilance to prevent the violation of the revenue laws of the United States, and in particular to prevent the illicit introduction of slaves into the United States; and, in order to do this the more effectually, he will prohibit all vessels from entering the river St. Mary's.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM.

The OFFICER com'dg at Charleston, S. C.

Extract of a letter from George Graham, acting Secretary of War, to Major James Bankhead, Charleston, South Carolina, dated

NOVEMBER 12, 1817.

I am instructed by the President to direct you to repair immediately to Point Petre, with the effective force under your command, leaving only an officer and a few men as a guard at Forts Moultrie and Johnson. Captain Wilson has been ordered to repair with his company now at Fort Johnson, North Carolina, to Point Petre; and a detachment of new recruits, under the command of Captain Hook, who was on his route to join the fourth infantry, has also been ordered to that place. The troops enumerated above, and those now stationed at Point Petre, will constitute a force of more than two hundred men, of which you will take the command, until the arrival of General Gaines. A remittance of five thousand dollars has been made to your battalion quartermaster, whom you will take with you; and you will make requisitions for the necessary supply of provisions on the contractor's agents. It will be advisable to take from Charleston a supply of salted meat, and a sufficient quantity of flour and hard bread to serve two hundred and fifty men for thirty days at least.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Nov. 12, 1817.

SIR: It appearing to the satisfaction of the President that the persons who have lately taken possession of Amelia Island have done it without the sanction of any of the Spanish colonies, or of any organized government whatever, and for purposes unfriendly to and incompatible with the interests of the United States, he has decided to break up that establishment, and take temporary possession of Amelia Island. For this purpose, the troops ordered to assemble at Point Petre will co-operate with the naval force which has been ordered to St. Mary's, under the command of Captain Henley.

It is the anxious wish of the President that this should be accomplished without the effusion of blood; and he confidently hopes that the force destined for the purpose will be of such an imposing character as to induce those persons who now have the military occupation of the island to abandon it without the exercise of force; but, if it should be found to be indispensably necessary, force must be used. You will, therefore, immediately on the arrival of Captain Henley at St. Mary's, and in conjunction with him, despatch an officer to demand the abandonment of the island by those who now exercise authority there, and take such other measures as may be deemed proper to obtain the peaceable possession of it; also for the preservation of the property of those persons who were resident in the island when it was first captured by General McGregor. Should your demand for the evacuation of Amelia be complied with, you will then occupy with a part of your force the position of Fernandina, and take care that the cannon and other implements of war which belonged to the port, when captured by General McGregor, are not taken off.

If peaceable possession of the island, however, cannot be obtained, and it should be the opinion of Captain Henley and yourself that your joint forces are not competent to the prompt and certain reduction of the naval and military forces which may then occupy the harbor and post of Fernandina, you will, in that event, make a requisition on General Floyd, or such other officer as may command that division of the militia of Georgia in which Point Petre is situated, for a force not exceeding five hundred men, to be held in readiness to march at a moment's warning, and await the arrival of General Gaines, who has been ordered to Point Petre, for ulterior measures.

You will take with you from Charleston the necessary military stores, and such heavy cannon as may be required for the reduction of the fort on Amelia Island, in the event of resistance.

As no answer has been received to the communication addressed to you from this Department on the 17th July last, it becomes necessary to request that the receipt of this may be acknowledged, and that you also advise this Department regularly of your movements.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAM.

Major JAMES BANKHEAD,
Commanding at Charleston, S. C.

FERNANDINA, AMELIA ISLAND,
December 24, 1817.

SIR: I have the honor to lay before you the correspondence held with General Aury, the late commander of this place, and to inform you that the American flag was raised here yesterday afternoon.

Several days will elapse before General Aury can withdraw his followers; but I have taken every measure to insure tranquillity, by ordering all his black soldiers to be embarked on board one of the ships lying in the port, and by not suffering any person to appear in the town with arms, but his officers; and the moment their vessels are prepared to receive the whole of them, they shall depart.

Suppression of Piratical Establishments.

Most of the inhabitants of this place, at this time, are followers of Aury, and those persons who have been drawn here from motives of speculation, who are, I suspect, of that profligate character generally engaged in the violation or evasion of our revenue laws. I shall, therefore, consult with Commodore Henley, and will enforce such regulations as may be most likely to preserve order until I receive instructions from the Government.

Until this place is completely evacuated by this band of negroes and privateersmen, I have deemed it prudent to keep the whole of my force here. On their departure I shall move all but one company to Point Petre. I have, &c.

JAS. BANKHEAD, Major, &c.

GEO. GRAHAM, Esq., Acting Sec'y Navy.

FERNANDINA, AMELIA ISLAND,
December 27, 1817.

SIR: I had the honor to forward to the War Department, on the 24th instant a copy of the correspondence with General Aury, previous to the landing of the troops under my command; and I herewith send a duplicate of the same.

Some difficulty has arisen from a want of competent authority to settle the disputed claims of the residents of this place against the late Government and the followers of Aury, who do not seem disposed to comply with their engagements.

One or two vessels have arrived here with cargoes, which the owners are desirous to land; and it might be improper to permit it, without obtaining security for the duties which the laws of the United States require. And other vessels, loaded in this port, have met with some delay in clearing for their destination. But the counsel of General Gaines, who arrived here last night, will regulate my conduct, and will in a great measure relieve my anxiety.

I have been obliged to exercise my authority, as commanding officer at this place, to preserve order; and I am happy to say that nothing unpleasant has occurred. I cannot say when General Aury and his party will sail. Their vessels are much out of order, and their arrangements to that effect progress but slowly. The morning after I landed, I ordered all the black and French troops to be embarked on board some of their vessels; but the crews of their privateers, and many others of all nations, whom it is difficult to restrain from violence and excess, are still here.

Until I am honored with your instructions, I hope that the course I may pursue may meet the approbation of the President.

General Gaines leaves this for the western frontier of Georgia the day after to-morrow.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES BANKHEAD,
Major, &c., comm'g this port.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 13, 1818.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose, herewith, copies of orders to Captain John H. Elton and Commodore John D. Henley, in relation to Amelia Island; also, a letter from the latter officer, communicating information of the surrender of that place to the military and naval force of the United States, together with the correspondence which took place on that occasion.

I have the honor to be, &c.

B. W. CROWNINSHIELD.

The PRESIDENT OF THE U. S.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, July 16, 1817.

SIR: Proceed immediately with the United States brig Saranac under your command to the river St. Mary's in Georgia, and inform the military commander of your arrival, and of the objects specially designated to you in these orders.

The recent occupation of Amelia Island by an officer in the service of the Spanish revolutionists occasions just apprehensions that, from the vicinity to the coast of Georgia, attempts will be made to introduce slaves into the United States contrary to the existing laws, and further attempts at illicit trade in smuggling goods, in violation of our revenue laws.

You are hereby directed to detain and search every vessel, under whatever flag, which may enter the river St. Mary's, or be found hovering upon the coast under suspicious circumstances, and seize every vessel freighted with slaves, or whose doubtful character and situation shall indicate an intention of smuggling.

In the execution of these orders, you will take special care not to interrupt or detain any vessels sailing with regular papers, and of a national character, upon lawful voyages to or from a port or ports of the United States.

The traffic in slaves is intended to be restrained, and in the performance of this duty you will exercise your sound judgment in regard to all vessels you may visit.

Communicate frequently to this Department every event connected with this service; and if it shall be found necessary, a further naval force will be sent, either to strengthen your command, or to relieve you, so as to pursue your original destination. If you find it necessary, upon your arrival at St. Mary's, to employ a good pilot, well acquainted with the coast, rivers, and inlets, you are authorized to do so.

I am, very respectfully, &c.

B. W. CROWNINSHIELD.

Captain JOHN H. ELTON,
Com'dg U. S. brig Saranac, N. Y.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Nov. 14, 1817.

SIR: Having been appointed to the command of the United States ship John Adams, you are hereby ordered, in conformity to the wishes of the President of the United States, to proceed forthwith to the port of St. Mary's, in Georgia, taking with you the United States brigs Enterprise and Prometheus, and the schooner Lynx, if the two latter have arrived in New York, and are in a state of readiness to accompany you; but you will not procrastinate the departure of the ship John Adams on account of these vessels, as any of them not fully prepared to proceed with you shall be ordered to join you as soon as practicable at St. Mary's, at which place you will find the United States brig Saranac, Captain John H. Elton, and gunboat No. 168, Lieutenant Commandant R. McCall; both of which vessels will act under your orders.

The object of the President of the United States in ordering this naval force to St. Mary's is to remove from Amelia Island the persons who have lately taken possession thereof, and, as it is understood and believed, without authority from the colonies, or any organized Government whatever, and to the great annoyance of the United States. It has therefore been determined that these persons shall be removed from that island, and that possession shall be taken, for the present, by the land and naval forces of the United States.

On your arrival at St. Mary's, you will consult with the officer commanding the military force, who is instructed to co-operate with you in the performance of this service.

It is hoped that these persons will withdraw without bloodshed; and you will, for this purpose, should your relative rank be superior to that of the commanding officer of the land forces, make known to the chief commanding in Amelia the determination of the Government of the United States to take possession of the island; and if the said chief, and the armed forces under his command, will peaceably quit the island, you will permit them so to do, taking special care that no depredations be committed on the inhabitants, whom it will be your duty to protect from violation of injury, either in their persons or property.

Should the force, however, now in command of the island, contrary to all expectations, resist and refuse absolutely to give up and abandon the same, you are, in co-operation with the military force of the United States, to proceed and take possession of the island in the name and by the authority of the United States.

Should you fall in with, on your way to St. Mary's, or find in Amelia, any vessels from the United States, armed and equipped by American citizens, acting as privateers, contrary to the laws of the United States, you will capture such, and send them to Savannah, in Georgia, to be dealt with according to law.

You will detain all prizes, or other vessels having slaves on board, as the presumption is strong that they are intended to be smuggled into the United States. You will report, from time to time, to this Department the operations of the force under your command.

I am, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

B. W. CROWNINSHEILD.
Secretary of the Navy.

Commodore J. D. HENLEY.

P. S. These orders are not to be delivered to any person.

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, OFF AMELIA,
December 24, 1817.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit a copy of the correspondence with General Aury, late commander of this place, and to inform you that the American flag was yesterday hoisted at Fernandina, and the Island of Amelia taken possession of by the land forces under Major Bankhead, of the United States artillery.

The black troops of General Aury have been embarked on board one of their ships lying in the port, and the remainder of his followers will be sent off the island as soon as the necessary arrangement can be made for the purpose. They are now engaged in watering their ships, and in the course of a week I hope to see all of them over the bar.

Most of the respectable inhabitants of this place retired on its capture by McGregor, and those now here are principally adventurers, who have been attracted by motives of speculation, and, as I suspect, and have every reason to believe, been engaged in the violation of the revenue laws; to prevent which in future, such precautions will be taken as are within my power, and which will, I presume, be adequate to the purpose.

I have not yet been able to examine the ship, and therefore can give you but little further information than was contained in my last communication. The leaks (the principal of which is about two feet under water) still continue, so that we make twenty inches of water per hour—and this lying in port. We are obliged to examine the magazine twice a day, to clear it of the water. I shall land all the powder immediately, to prevent any further damage. The bread, except a very small quantity, is entirely ruined, and unfit for use. I shall order a survey to ascertain the exact quantity of stores damaged, and inform you as early as circumstances will admit.

I shall also inform you by the next mail (which leaves St. Mary's on Saturday next) more particularly of the state of the ship than has heretofore been in my power; the object of the expedition not having been effected, rendering it impracticable to examine her thoroughly. I am, however, entirely convinced, in my own mind, that the battery now on the ship is too heavy for her; so much so, that I should deem her unsafe for a long cruise. I have the honor to be, &c.

J. D. HENLEY.

Hon. B. W. CROWNINSHEILD,
Secretary of the Navy.

U. S. SHIP JOHN ADAMS, OFF AMELIA,
December 30, 1817.

SIR: Since my arrival here, I have been so much engaged that I have not had one moment to write to my friends. You, no doubt, however, have some idea of my situation, and from my official reports, know that the American flag is now flying on Amelia Island. As there are many novel cases which must present themselves, I should have been better pleased had my instructions been full; but we are now left to act as circumstances may require, and I am fearful that Aury and his followers will give us much trouble before they quit the island. I am sorry to add that the Americans appear to be much worse than any others. Should we be able to get through this business, so as to meet the approbation of the Department, I shall feel much gratified; but I trust, should I err in any steps that I may take, that it will be considered by the President as an error of judgment; for I do assure you that nothing would be so pleasing to me as to have my conduct here approved by the Executive. I have endeavored to keep as close to the letter of my instructions as possible, and have avoided every difficulty that I possibly could. I regret very much the difficulty of communicating with the Government. We have only one mail per week, and that does not remain in St. Mary's long enough to enable us to answer letters that we may receive by it.

The situation of my ships you are no doubt acquainted with, as I have written several times to the Secretary on that subject. I, however, do not wish to leave this place until everything is settled, and the Government have established some kind of police for the better government of this place, which, I am in hopes, will take place ere long. I am fearful that Aury expects that the American Government will relinquish Amelia, which impression will retard his departure. I have, &c.

J. D. HENLEY.

IMPRISONMENT OF R. W. MEADE.

[Communicated to the House, January 29, 1818.]
To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 23d of December last, requesting information relative to the imprisonment and detention in confinement of Richard W. Meade, a citizen of the United States, I now transmit to the House a report from the Secretary of State containing the information required.

JANUARY 29, 1818.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Jan. 28, 1816.

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 23d of December last, requesting the President to cause to be laid before the House any information he may be able to communicate relative to the imprisonment and detention in confinement of Richard W. Meade, a citizen of the United States, has the honor of submitting to the President the accompanying papers received at the department on that subject, with a letter addressed to the Minister of Spain, residing here, since the resolution of the House, and the answer received from him.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

[Correspondence concerning Richard W. Meade, communicated to the Department of State by Mr. Erving.]

No. 1.

Mr. Erving to Mr. Monroe.

MADRID, September 28, 1816.

SIR: Perceiving by the public papers that the case of R. W. Meade, a citizen of the United States, for many years established at Cadiz in commerce, and now suffering in prison by order of this Government, has excited considerable sensation in America, it seems to be proper that I should submit to you my correspondence with Mr. Cevallos on this subject.

I have herewith the honor to enclose my note to that Minister of August 27th, his reply of September 10th, and my further note of September

Imprisonment of R. W. Meade.

16th. To this last I have not yet received an answer. I have the honor to be, &c.,

GEORGE W. ERVING.

No. 2.

MADRID, August 27, 1816.

SIR: It is my duty to recall the attention of His Majesty's Government to the case of Richard W. Meade, a citizen of the United States, who is imprisoned by the authorities at Cadiz, under semblance of law and of His Majesty's authority, but, as must be presumed, against his will, and, as can be substantiated, against his orders issued on the 10th August, 1815.

A particular statement of circumstances of the case was transmitted to your Excellency by the Secretary of this Legation, in a note of July 8th last; it is, therefore, needless that I should now recite them.

I propose to refer to your documents only, each of them of principal importance, and which, taken in their connexion, point out most distinctly and indisputably the illegality of the proceedings against Mr. Meade, and the course which consistency, as well as justice, requires to be now taken for his relief.

The documents to which I refer, and copies of which are herewith enclosed, are, viz:

No. 1. An order of the Consulado of Cadiz, dated February 18, 1814, directing Meade to deposit in the office of the Treasury General of the province a certain sum of money, respecting which a process was then pending in the said Consulado.

No. 2. The receipt of the Intendant of the Treasury for the deposit made by Meade, pursuant to the order of the Consulado.

No. 3. The reply of the Intendant of the Consulado, when that tribunal inquired as to the nature of the deposit made.

No. 4. A royal decree, of August 10, 1815, suspending the further proceedings of the Consulado, till the Treasury should be able to collect funds for the purpose of restoring the sum deposited by Meade.

It is not my intention, for it would be altogether useless, to enter into a history of the original transactions upon which, finally, a suit was brought before the Consulado of Cadiz against Mr. Meade, and is now continued in the name of Mr. John McDermot.

Meade always held the moneys in question, to be paid over in legal form as the competent authorities should direct.

Your Excellency will, I am persuaded, now examine the affair with impartiality, and free from the impressions unfavorable to this American with which it has been attempted to pre-occupy your judgment. If it were my duty, on the other hand, to state what ought to be his personal merits in the view of this Government, I should dwell upon the very extensive and important services which, as a merchant and a capitalist, he rendered to Spain in the crisis of her affairs the most trying and difficult. It ought surely to be known to your Excellency that he contributed most essentially to the cause of this country, by giving large credits to its occasional Governments, and that for these services he is not yet reimbursed. But I have not to ask any favor for him. I desire but strict and impartial justice; and I found my claim to his immediate release from prison on the acts of the Government in whose name, and of the very tribunal by which, he is now imprisoned.

By the first two of the enclosed documents, your Excellency will perceive that Mr. Meade, submitting to the orders of the Consulado, paid the amount of the moneys in suit into the Treasury of the province. The payment is said to have been effected in "libramientos," or receipts for libramientos of the Treasury General, or Intendant; credits of Meade with the Treasury, which were payable in specie, and which were to be paid in specie within a few days. The Intendant, therefore, readily gave to Meade the receipt (No. 2) for a deposit in specie, the libramientos being cancelled, and passed to the several accounts to which they belonged. Thus, therefore, every legal and formal requisite being complied with, Meade was exonerated from all responsibility; and, to make his irresponsibility still more perfect, if that were possible, the Intendant wrote to the Consulado, (No. 3.) stating expressly that the deposit had been made in specie, and that he would respond to the Consulado for specie.

After such conclusive proceedings, it would seem impossible that Mr. Meade could be again questioned by the tribunal in the same matter.

Was the tribunal wrong in ordering him to make the deposit? Sibi imputent—let it answer for its own errors. Was the Intendant culpable in receiving the libramientos as specie? He is then to be censured. But he has expressly made himself responsible to the Consulado for specie; let him then be held to that responsibility. These may be questions between the Government and its officers, but it is certainly highly unjust that an individual should be sacrificed to repair their errors. Will it be said that the libramientos delivered to the Treasury, and credited to Meade as cash, and held by the Treasury in deposit, and promised by the Intendant to be paid over as cash, are not, in fact, equivalent to cash? Certainly not. The Government will not pass this condemnation on its own securities. But if the contrary supposition were admissible, even then Mr. Meade remains exempt from all responsibility; for the libramientos in question have been already passed into account, as paid in specie, and have been cancelled by the officer who had the competent authority to do so. Nevertheless, the Consulado, which, by its own act, had precluded itself from all further jurisdiction over Mr. Meade in this matter, still persisted in its process against him, and decreed that he should pay over to that tribunal the sum which he had previously deposited, by its own order, in the Treasury.

Imprisonment of R. W. Meade.

Against this injustice, Mr. Meade appealed to the superior tribunal of the province; but its interference was overruled by the tribunal of war at Madrid; and this latter confirmed the sentence of the Consulado of Cadiz.

Mr. Meade was then obliged to resort to the sovereign, who had issued the decree of August 10, 1815. This decree is, in all its parts, perfectly just. It suspends the proceeding of the Consulado against Meade, and acknowledges the validity of the deposit made, by directing as it were funds to be collected for effecting the return of the money by the Intendant, to the end that it might be paid into the Consulado; and that, in the meantime, till funds be collected for the purpose of effecting the return of this deposit, the tribunal of commerce shall suspend all proceedings against Meade, &c.

Of this decree neither party can complain; how, then, has it been reversed? If there has been any delay in the payment to be made by the Treasury, that is not Meade's fault; the decree is illimited; it orders all proceedings against him to be suspended till that object be effected.

It is not my purpose to call into question the justice of Mr. McDermot's demand, or to blame any of his proceedings; but what I state with confidence is, that his claim is now properly on the Treasury or Intendant. If the Consulado or Intendant have, in the course of their proceedings, changed the situation of Mr. McDermot's case for the worse, they have done him wrong, and it is of them that he should complain; but they have acted in virtue of their regular faculties, and have exonerated Mr. Meade; or had their conduct been even illegal, yet Meade cannot be made responsible for it; he had not any control over them, or any means of resisting them.

It was very natural for him to offer the deposit in libramientos, but he did not force the Intendant to receive them; that was his own act. Nor, indeed, does there appear to be anything irregular in that act, since payment was due by the Treasury on the libramientos. The transaction was then the same, in effect, as though the Intendant had paid to Meade the amount of the libramientos in specie, and then received back that specie in deposit; and it was effected in that form also; so that, if there was any fault in the Intendant, it was that of paying Meade what was due to him. But this, I presume, cannot be called a fault, or, if so, the transaction cannot be vitiated by it. The Intendant, then, having informed the Consulado that the deposit had been made in specie, and that he was responsible to the Consulado for specie, Mr. Meade is of course exempt from all further process; and the royal decree above cited considered him so to be.

But now, sir, a second time this Consulado, which, as I have shown, having ordered Mr. Meade to deposit in the Treasury, did thus, by its own act, absolve him from its jurisdiction, renews its demand on him for another deposit to the same amount, and, in defiance of His Majesty's decree, on Meade's non-compliance, has thrown him into a dungeon.

Surely there cannot be any law to authorize the imprisonment, as a condemned felon, of a defendant in an action for debt yet pending; much less can it be permitted that any authority should amend its own faults and errors by sacrificing the liberty, property, and domestic happiness of an individual; and still less is it possible that His Majesty should allow the continuance of such proceedings in a case where his own treasury is the depository of the funds in question, which, by his own decree, have been ordered to be paid over in satisfaction of the judgment. It is with entire confidence, therefore, that I request your Excellency to lay this representation before the King, not doubting but that he will order that Mr. Meade be immediately released from confinement, and that the royal decree of August 10, 1815, be maintained and observed. I have, &c.,

PALACE, September 10, 1816.

SIR: I have given an account to His Majesty of your note of the 27th of last month, relative to Mr. Richard Meade; and it is His Majesty's pleasure that I should inform you, that as his case is pending before the Supreme Council of War, he must have recourse to it.

By His Majesty's orders, the Council of War presented to His Majesty a report on the affair pending in the tribunals of Spain between the creditors of a commercial house in London, in a state of failure, and Mr. Richard Meade.

It states the restitution of a deposit of upwards of $50,000 in specie, made to Meade by the said house in failure at London, and that he attempted to restore the money demanded of him in credits of the Treasury.

The council reports against Meade, and states that he availed himself of this circumstance with a view to surprise the equity of the sovereign to the very great injury of strict justice, of the interests of the bankrupt house and of its creditors; and afterwards gave it as their opinion (dictamen) that His Majesty ought not, in opposition to the laws, to agree to the petition of Meade, who should deliver up the aforesaid deposit, in like manner, and in the same specie as he had received it, or give full, clear, and sufficient security, to the satisfaction of the tribunal of commerce of Cadiz; and, in default thereof, to be removed to a public prison, to prevent all evasion of the sentence against him.

His Majesty thereupon assented to the opinion (dictamen) of the council, to which Meade is to conform. I renew, &c.,

MADRID, September 16, 1816.

SIR: On the 13th instant I received your Excellency's note of the 10th instant, in reply to mice of 27th August, respecting the case of R. W. Meade, a citizen of the United States, now detained in a felons' prison at Cadiz. I had required that Mr. Meade should be released from his confinement, because, on a review of the proceedings against him, and reference to the documents enclosed in my note of August 27, I found that those proceedings were unjust, since the object of them was to compel him to pay a sum of money which he had already paid in virtue of a judicial decree; and illegal, as well for that reason, as because they were in violation of His Majesty's own decree of August 14, 1815.

Your Excellency has not thought proper to revert to these antecedents, but you have been pleased to confine yourself to a simple narrative of what has passed in the council of war subsequent to the date of His Majesty's decree, and upon this ground to refer the party aggrieved to this same council of war. If I understood your Excellency's note aright, it states that a posterior decision of the council of war has declared His Majesty's decree of August 14, 1815, to be unjust and illegal, and has advised His Majesty to reverse it, and to put Mr. Meade in prison, until he shall have paid the sum demanded of him; and further, that His Majesty has complied with this extraordinary dictamen; that thus Meade is actually in prison, with the knowledge and consent of His Majesty, who has thought proper to render his own decree a dead letter. These are facts which I could not suppose to have existed, and to which I should have found it very difficult to have given credit, had I not thus received them from your Excellency. In truth, they may be considered as determining the perpetual imprisonment of Mr. Meade; for it cannot be imagined, even if he be able to pay, that he will ever consent to pay a second time that sum which he has before deposited in His Majesty's treasury, and for which the treasury has formally made itself responsible.

In this last consulta of the council of war, it is stated that Mr. Meade attempted to restore the money demanded of him in credits of the treasury, (intenta devolver en papeles de credito contra Tesoreria.) By this phraseology the fact has been concealed from His Majesty of the payment which was actually made by Meade to the Treasurer General, for the amount of which, in specie, the said Treasurer General formally made himself responsible to the Consulado.

This fact, I say, was not stated to His Majesty, as it should have been, by the council of war. If your Excellency will take the trouble of reverting to my note of the 27th ultimo, you will see that it is therein specially set forth, supported by conclusive documentary proof, and that upon it is very principally founded the reclamation which I have made in favor of Mr. Meade.

This remains, then, in all its former force, and altogether unanswered by your Excellency's note. But to simplify the case as much as possible, to disembarass it of all legal questions and discussions arising out of Mr. McDermot's claim, or belonging to the antecedent proceedings; in fine, that both parties may have justice in a mode comporting with the good faith and consistency of the Government, I now place my demand in another form.

Considering that Mr. Meade, in pursuance of a judicial decision of the Consulado of Cadiz, did, on the 19th of February, 1814, pay into the office of the Treasurer General of the province the sum of 1,050,327v.

Considering that the said Treasurer General did acknowledge the said payment to have been made in specie, and did promise to repay specie whenever called upon;

Finally, considering that the funds in question are actually in the royal treasury;

For these reasons, I require that the Treasurer General be ordered immediately to pay over the same funds, in specie, to whomsoever the Consulado of Cadiz shall appoint to receive them.

SIR: Having laid before the King your note of the 16th September last, relative to Mr. Richard Meade, I have received His Majesty's commands to inform you that the affair of this individual being under the especial cognizance of the supreme council of war, it is to this tribunal that his reclamations must be addressed.

I renew to you, &c.

Mr. Erving to Mr. Cevallos.

MADRID, October 21, 1816.

SIR: In a note of September 18, upon the case of R. W. Meade, an American citizen in prison at Cadiz, I required that the Treasurer General of that district should be ordered to pay over to such person as the Consulado of Cadiz should appoint to receive the same, the moneys which have been deposited with the said Treasurer General by said Meade, in obedience to a judicial order of the said Consulado.

In your Excellency's reply of the 17th instant, you are pleased to tell me that the affairs of Mr. Meade being rooted (radicados) in the supreme council of war, to that tribunal he ought to resort.

In this your Excellency has reference, I presume, to a certain suit brought against Mr. Meade by Mr. John McDermot; you certainly do not mean to be understood that all affairs whatever of Mr. Meade are to be subjected to the decision of the council of war, nor can I conceive that any such connexion between the suit of Mr. McDermot and the demands of Mr. Meade on His Majesty's treasury can be established as can bring these last within the cognizance of that tribunal.

Permit me to ask whether the supreme council of war has the faculty of ordering the Treasurer

General of Andalusia to pay over the funds which Mr. Meade deposited with him to such persons as the Consulado of Cadiz may appoint to receive them?

If so, I will request your Excellency to lay before that tribunal the demand made in my last note, according to the practice in similar cases; but if the tribunal of war has no such faculty, then the order which I have requested can be given only by the Executive Government. My application for its interference was perfectly correct, and your Excellency's reference to the tribunal is, as to any useful object, perfectly nugatory; for Mr. Meade must necessarily be answered that the tribunal has not any control over His Majesty's treasury. I had flattered myself with a hope that, in our conference on the 5th instant, I had succeeded in convincing your Excellency that the case between Mr. Meade and Mr. McDermot, and that between Mr. Meade and His Majesty's treasury, were altogether distinct. I do not solicit any act of injustice against Mr. McDermot, and I ought to presume that it is His Majesty's desire to do justice to Mr. Meade. In acceding to my demand in his favor, your Excellency will accomplish that desire; and so far from impugning the claims of Mr. McDermot, the effect of the measure will be to satisfy them by payment, and to extinguish all the processes to which they had given rise.

I do trust, then, on reconsidering the case, your Excellency will perceive that only two inquiries are necessary, viz: whether Mr. Meade did, by order of the Consulado, deposit the funds in question with the Treasurer General; and whether they yet exist in the hands of the treasurer. Of these facts I have already laid before you indisputable proof in the papers marked Nos. 1, 2, 3, transmitted to you with my note of August 27, viz: No. 1. The order of the Consulado, directing Meade to deposit. No. 2. The receipt of the Treasurer General for the deposit made. No. 3. The acknowledgment of the treasurer that he holds said deposit in specie, subject to the orders of the Consulado. It is for want of these funds, now in His Majesty's treasury, that Mr. Meade is in prison; the payment of them to the order of the Consulado will quiet all claims, and satisfy all parties, and will not interfere with the jurisdiction, or require the intermediation of any tribunal whatever.

He recurs, then, to the King, whose power to enforce is as indisputable as his disposition to do right; and I, on his part, require only the plainest act of justice when I demand that an express royal order be issued for his immediate liberation from prison, and for the payment of the funds deposited by him in the royal treasury of the province to the Consulado of Cadiz, or to such person as it may appoint to receive the same.

I remain, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

GEORGE W. ERVING.

SIR: I have laid before His Majesty your note of the 21st of last month, in which you insist that the sums deposited by Mr. R. Meade in the royal treasury should be paid over to the tribunal of commerce of Cadiz, or to whomsoever it may authorize to receive them. This affair appertaining to the Ministry of the Treasury, His Majesty has been pleased to determine that your said note be transmitted to the Secretary of that Department, that, through this channel, it may again be submitted to His Majesty's decision.

MADRID, May 12, 1817.

By my despatches, Nos. 20, 23, 26, I had the honor to submit to you copies of the first part of my correspondence with the Spanish Secretary of State, on the case of Richard W. Meade. As that gentleman, despairing of the success of my efforts in his favor, desires that the whole of his case may be laid before you, I now transmit copies of all the notes which have passed on it since the month of November.

SIR: On the 7th November your Excellency replied to my note of 21st of October, on the case of R. W. Meade, an American citizen in prison at Cadiz, that you had transmitted the same to the Minister of Hacienda, that the royal resolution might be given through that ministry. In consequence, as I presume, of your Excellency's communication to the Minister of Hacienda, Mr. Navarrete, the Treasurer General, wrote to the Consulado of Cadiz on the 19th of November; the answer of that tribunal is dated on the 29th of November. It is completely satisfactory and in perfect accord with what I have stated to you on the case. Why a copy of it has not been already transmitted to you, I will not undertake to conjecture; but seeing that this document, as well as others in the cause, do virtually confess that the proceedings against Mr. Meade are of the unjust and violent character which I have attributed to them, and that every unnecessary delay is an augmentation of the injustice, as I ought to believe, and am persuaded, entirely contrary to the disposition of His Majesty—for these reasons I pray your Excellency to demand from the Minister of Hacienda a copy of Mr. Navarrete's aforesaid correspondence with the Consulado, and to lay it, in conjunction with my representations, before His Majesty.

GEORGE W. ERVING.

No. 10.

Mr. Erving to Mr. Pizarro.

MADRID, March 14, 1817.

SIR: In a note of September 16, 1816, to your Excellency's predecessor, I required that the Treasurer General of the district of Cadiz should be ordered to pay, to such person as the Consulado of Cadiz should appoint to receive the same, a certain sum of money, which had been deposited with the said Treasurer by R. W. Meade, an American citizen, in obedience to an order of said Consulado, and for which sum said Meade then was, as he still is, held in prison.

Having been answered by Mr. Cevallos, generally, that the affair of Mr. Meade was before the council of war, I insisted on my former demand, (in a further note of October 21,) showing to the Minister that it had no necessary connexion with any process depending before the council of war; and further, that it was not possible for the council to satisfy my reclamation, even if it should be disposed to do so, because it had no faculty to give such orders to his Majesty's treasurer as I had desired.

In answer to that note, your Excellency was pleased to inform me, on the 7th of November, that, as my demand related to the duties of the Minister of Hacienda, His Majesty had resolved that my note of 21st October should be passed to that Minister, to the end that through that department the royal resolution should be given. ("Se pasa la citada nota al señor Secretario de dicho Departamento para que por su conducto recayga la real resolución.")

In consequence, I presume, of this measure, the Treasurer General, Señor Navarrete, wrote to the Consulado of Cadiz, on the 19th of November, requiring that tribunal to inform him particularly as to the aforesaid deposit. The Consulado replied to the treasurer on the 29th of November, that the deposit had been made by its order; that it had been made "in effective specie," ("en libramientos de plata efectiva;") that it existed at the treasury; and that the treasurer had made himself responsible to the said Consulado for the amount.

I annex to this note a copy of that most important correspondence between the Treasurer and the Consulado, and which your Excellency was pleased also to procure a copy of from the Minister of Hacienda, pursuant to the request contained in my note of December 25.

This correspondence leaves not the least doubt as to the nature of the deposit, or its actual existence; and I assured myself that it was all that could be desired, and that it must necessarily produce an immediate order for the release of Mr. Meade from prison. I am therefore much surprised to find that the affair, instead of having been despatched, as I understood by your Excellency's note of November 7 that it would be, has again fallen back into the hands of the council of war; which tribunal, as before observed, cannot have any control over the operations of His Majesty's Treasury.

If the council of war should enter into any inquiry as to the nature of the deposit, can the result, whatever it may be, of that inquiry, be opposed to the complete, plain, unequivocal declaration of the Consulado of Cadiz, the very tribunal by order of which the deposit was made, which is most interested to ascertain its nature, and its actual existence? But in no view can it be of the least importance in considering, or should it have the least influence in deciding, upon my reclamation, whether the deposit is, or is not, satisfactory to the council of war; and therefore I will not here enter into its past and present proceedings, nor will I advise Mr. Meade to appear before that tribunal to prove anything which may relate to the nature of that deposit. It is sufficient that the deposit was made by the order of the Consulado; that it was paid into His Majesty's Treasury, and is now there. All this is proved by the confession of the Consulado itself; and I cannot acknowledge the justice of any plea for holding Mr. Meade in prison, by a decision of another of His Majesty's tribunals, for the very sum thus deposited.

His Majesty's Treasury has the money in question. Mr. Meade is suffering in prison under His Majesty's authority! What can be more simple than the course pointed out by justice in this case?

As the representative of the American Government, the natural protector of its citizens against all injustice, I appeal directly to His Catholic Majesty against the injustice of those acting in his name and under his authority; and I request your Excellency, as the proper channel of communication, to lay my reclamation before him. And if His Majesty should desire to be more particularly informed of the proceedings of the council of war, and of all the persecutions which this American citizen (who, I cannot but remind your Excellency, so much contributed to support the cause of Spain in the most critical epoch of her affairs) has suffered; then if His Majesty will condescend to peruse the last memorial which Mr. Meade addressed to him, he will, I doubt not, see enough to reprehend.

GEORGE W. ERVING.

No. 11.

Mr. Erving to Mr. Pizarro.

MADRID, March 24, 1817.

SIR: With my note of the 14th instant upon the case of R. W. Meade, an American citizen confined in the castle at Cadiz, I transmitted to your Excellency what ought to be considered as the most satisfactory and conclusive evidence relative to the nature and the actual existence of the deposit made by him in the royal treasury of that district, by order of the Consulado of Cadiz. It appeared to me that nothing further could be required, and, if your Excellency would lay it before His Majesty pursuant to my request, that it must produce an instant order for the release of Mr. Meade; but seeing that the sufferings of this individual still continue, I cannot omit any measure, however superfluous it may appear, which may possibly contribute to his release, heaping proof upon proof of the injustice done to him. It is therefore that I now send to you (herewith enclosed) a certificate, dated 15th of March, (regularly authenticated,) of Don Antonio Ysarbe, "contador principal de rentas provinciales" of Cadiz, who is the only person authorized to grant certificates relative to the operations of the treasury in that district, and through whose hands all such matters must necessarily pass. This certificate has been granted on the petition of Mr. Meade, which I also take the liberty of enclosing.

I beg your Excellency's particular attention to this certificate; it is ample and explicit in every respect, and I am persuaded must convince you that no further research on the points in question can be necessary. I therefore confidently re-urge my request, that your Excellency would be pleased to lay my reclamation before the King; and I rely on His Majesty's just dispositions for the immediate release of Mr. Meade.

GEORGE W. ERVING.

Mr. Pizarro to Mr. Erving.

MADRID, April 12, 1817.

SIR: Immediately that I received your note of the 24th of last March, I directed, by order of the King, my master, the supreme council of war to despatch with all urgency the "consulta" which had been required of it, relative to the affairs of Mr. Richard Meade with the house of Hunter, Raynes & Co., of London; and I wait for the said consulta to lay the matter before His Majesty, and to obtain his sovereign resolution.

I renew, &amp;c.,

JOSE PIZARRO.

No. 13.

Mr. Erving to Mr. Pizarro.

MADRID, May 9, 1817.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your Excellency's note of the 12th of April, in reply to mine of the 24th of March, relative to the case of Mr. Meade. You are pleased to inform me that on sight of my said note you ordered the council of war to despatch, in all haste, the "consulta" which you had previously asked of it, relative to the affairs "between Don Ricardo Meade and the house of Raynes, Hunter & Co., of London." I ought to presume that by this order your Excellency meant to promote the object of my former representations; but permit me to observe, referring to those representations, that in no part of them have I considered the termination of any process which may be pending before the council of war, between Mr. Meade and the English merchants, as at all essential to my purpose, which has been simply to obtain the release of an American citizen from an unjust imprisonment—an imprisonment which you yourself, in a letter of 15th Con. 1st Sess.—58

December 8 to the council of war, have declared to be illegal. In that letter your Excellency has said that Mr. Meade's case is not sufficiently comprehended within the law under the pretence of which he has been imprisoned: "quien, (Meade,) no esta bastante determinadamente comprendido en el caso de la ley que se cita para su arresto." Independent of this legal point, I have shown to your Excellency, in my former notes, that the imprisonment is unjust, because His Majesty's Treasury has the very funds which should be paid to satisfy the judgment of the tribunals. It was long since decided that Mr. Meade was a debtor to the English merchants; the funds in question had been deposited in the royal treasury, by order of the competent tribunals; and, it has been proved, by authentic and complete documents, that the deposit exists in the treasury as effective cash. What I have required, then, as a measure of the plainest justice, is, that these funds should be paid by the treasury, to satisfy the judgment. Thus Mr. Meade would be released from prison, of course; and all necessity of legal decision, as to the nature of his imprisonment, would be superseded; and all litigious questions between him and the English creditors would cease. I had certainly succeeded in impressing your Excellency with this view of the subject, for, as far back as the 7th of November, you informed me that the affair was properly within the Department of Hacienda, and that His Majesty would give his decision through that department. Under the same impression, doubtless, you wrote to the Minister of Hacienda, on the 4th of December, desiring that a statement of the facts within the cognizance of his department might be sent to you, to the end that you might submit them to His Majesty, to enable him to decide on the consulta of the council of war, (of November 28,) at that time before him. In the same way your Excellency wrote to the council of war, on the 8th of December, requiring that all the original documents which relate to the nature of the deposit made by Mr. Meade should be sent to you. Even in your letter of February the 7th, to the same council of war, by which you return to it the "antecedents," you confine your view principally to the existence and nature of the deposit.

Convinced, then, as your Excellency was, that the imprisonment of Meade was illegal, and as to the nature of the deposit, (a point which you considered all-important in the case, having before you the certificates of the officers of Hacienda, as well as of the Consulado of Cadiz, proving that it existed in effective specie,) I could not doubt but that you intended to submit the case to His Majesty's decision, as announced in your letter of December 4th to the Minister of Hacienda, and conformably to what I had repeatedly proposed. You have not been pleased to acquaint me with whatever motives you may have had for deviating from this intention; but it does appear that you have required of the council to determine on the legality of the imprisonment, which was its own act—an act of which, in your letter of December 8th, you expressed His Majesty's disapprobation, and the injustice of which has been made still more apparent by the above mentioned proofs as to the nature of the deposit. It appears, also, that you transmitted to the same council, in the month of February, documents which you demanded from it in the month of December, for the purpose of being laid before the King, but which are now to be enveloped in questions from which they had been, and stood, entirely separated.

In thus sending the affair back to the council, the parties (Meade and McDermot) are made uselessly to litigate about the nature of a deposit which the Government knows to exist, in specie, in its own treasury. Thus, the simple act of justice which I have demanded is procrastinated to an indefinite time, being made dependent upon contentious questions, with which it has no necessary connexion. Your Excellency is perfectly convinced, by documentary evidence of indisputable authority, from every department of the Hacienda, that the royal treasury is debtor to Meade for the amount, in specie, of the deposit made by him; that, with or without law, Meade has been twelve months, and still is, in prison, for the same amount due to the English claimants, for whose benefit the said deposit was made, by order of the tribunal which at that time had cognizance of the then pending suit; and it is evident that the repayment of this money would release Meade from prison, at the same time that it would satisfy the English creditors. Allow me, then, to ask, to what useful end is the Council of War now employed? To declare the illegality of its own acts? But all investigations of that nature will be rendered unnecessary by the repayment of the money now in the hands of Government. The council can decide to whom, of right, the money deposited belongs; but on this point there is no dispute. The deposit belongs, of right, to the English creditors, represented by McDermot. The council has no control over the treasury. In examining, therefore, into the nature of the deposit, it can have no other guide than the very official documents which have been before your Excellency. These are unequivocal and conclusive. It matters not now whether the deposit, in its original form, was, or was not, of a nature to satisfy the demands of the English creditor. We can dispense with an examination of that question also; because, in whatever form the deposit was originally made, it has been now converted, by regular fiscal operations, into effective cash; and in that form exists, and in that form will be readily received by Mr. McDermot. The documents which certify the real nature of the deposit can neither be called in question nor set aside by the council; nor is there any necessity of a judicial investigation to establish the authenticity or validity of them. Upon those grounds, therefore, I renew my demand, in every aspect of it so just, that your Excellency would lay this case ministerially before the King, and procure his order for the immediate repayment of the deposit existing in his treasury.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 4, 1817.

To his Excellency the President of the United States the following case is respectfully submitted:

Richard W. Meade was born in Chester county, in Pennsylvania, in June, 1778. He went to Spain in 1803, to claim restitution of property detained at Buenos Ayres; in which claim he was unsuccessful. He then established a commercial house at Cadiz, where he has ever since resided in the character of an American citizen, and having held, from 1806 till the present year, the station of navy agent of the United States for the port of Cadiz. Mr. Meade has a wife (the undersigned) and nine children, now residing in Philadelphia.

In their late struggles, he rendered essential services to the people of Spain, as repeatedly and publicly acknowledged. In 1812, being in actual advance to the Government of Spain to the amount of near eight hundred thousand dollars, and being satisfied that the Treasurer General, Don Victor Soret, was using the funds which by contract had been appropriated to repay that advance, he appealed to the Regency against the conduct of the Treasurer; and, receiving no satisfaction, published a pamphlet containing a statement of his contracts with the Government, and its injustice towards him; in consequence of which publication he was imprisoned for three months, and then released on bail. On an appeal to the Cortes, Mr. Meade obtained an order for the payment of his advances, which order has been but partially complied with, and that under enormous sacrifices, amounting, in many instances, to one-third of the capital, besides several years' interest, for which no allowance has ever been made. Mr. Meade also appealed to the Cortes against the unjust proceedings of the Regency in imprisoning him; the Cortes reported the proceedings as illegal and unjust, and decreed the Constitutional penalties against the Minister who gave, and the judge who executed, the order. The dismissal of the Regency by the Cortes, and the subsequent dissolution of the Cortes itself, on the arrival of King Ferdinand, prevented the report of the Cortes against the Regency being acted on; and the affair being revived by the Supreme Council of War, composed of men subservient to the old Regency, (who are now all in high offices round the Court,) it was lately decreed that Mr. Meade should pay a fine of two thousand ducats for the publication, which they termed a libel on the late regents.

It is to be understood that the affair above related, of the imprisonment in 1812, is altogether distinct from the present confinement of Mr. Meade and its causes, though often erroneously blended with it; it will clearly appear, however, that the rancor produced by the event related has operated with many now in power in stimulating the present persecution, the circumstances leading to which are as follows:

In 1811, Mr. Meade was appointed assignee to the estate of James W. Glass, of Cadiz, declared bankrupt in England, in consequence of his connexion with the house of Hunter, Rainy, and Co., of London, against whom a commission of bankruptcy had issued; the appointment of Mr. Meade was made by the tribunal of commerce of Cadiz, with the approbation of all the creditors in Cadiz, and was confirmed by the assignees in London—the tribunal of commerce having cognizance of all commercial affairs in Spain, and all persons carrying on trade there (even foreigners) being amenable thereto. Mr. Meade gave bonds, accordingly, to take charge of the estate, and to be responsible solely to the tribunal for the proceeds; being prohibited, under the penalty of the bonds, from disposing of the funds without the sanction of the tribunal.

Having settled the affairs of the estate, and paid all demands thereon, there remained in his hands about fifty-two thousand dollars, which he several times petitioned the tribunal to be permitted to remit to the assignees in London. The delays attending all Spanish proceedings prevented the petitions being acted upon, until Mr. Duncan Hunter, one of the principals of the bankrupt house, was sent to Cadiz; and when on the eve of getting the business settled, Mr. Glass, (escaping from his bail in England,) appeared also in Cadiz, and laid an embargo on the funds, under the pretence of having been illegally included in the bankruptcy. John McDermot was appointed as the agent of Hunter, and Mr. Meade offered to pay to Hunter or McDermot the amount in his hands, on their giving bonds satisfactory to the tribunal of commerce, in lieu of his own. Those persons not being able to procure such sureties as the tribunal would accept, that body suddenly, and of its own accord, decreed that Mr. Meade should, on the following morning, place the money in the King's treasury, until McDermot or Hunter should give the security required; it being declared that all Mr. Meade's property should be embargoed in case of non-payment at the time limited. In pursuance of the said order, Mr. Meade made the deposit on the following morning, and presented to the tribunal the receipt in which the treasurer acknowledged to have received the sum in question by order of the tribunal, to be held subject to the future disposition of that body. A question having been made, at the instigation of Mr. McDermot, whether the sum had been paid into the treasury in specie, or treasury notes, the intendant answered, to the official inquiry of the tribunal, that "the deposit had been made in due form under his inspection, in effective specie; and that whenever the tribunal should order its payment, His Majesty would pay it in the same coin."

Notwithstanding this, a suit was brought against Mr. Meade by McDermot; and the tribunal, aware that it had done wrong in ordering the deposit, decided that Mr. Meade should pay the money a second time! An appeal was entered from this decree to the superior tribunal, called alzadas, (Mr. Meade having a right to that appeal by the seventh and twentieth articles of the Treaty between the United States and Spain.) While the cause was there pending, the plaintiff (through the English Minister) procured an order for the removal of the case to the council of war at Madrid, where the sentence was confirmed. Mr. Meade had a right of appeal, but was refused. He petitioned the King, who commanded that he should be heard by the same court; but as Mr. Meade conceived the judges to have evinced a partiality in the case, at Mr. Meade's request, five new judges were added to the five of which the court was before composed. In this state of the case, McDermot presented a petition, stating that Mr. Meade was about to leave Spain, and praying that he should be compelled to pay the money or be put into confinement; and the order was accordingly granted (through the influence of the British Minister) by the five primitive judges, though the King had expressly decreed that no measure should be taken in the case of Mr. Meade but with the presence of the new judges. On the 2d of May, 1816, Mr. Meade was seized and imprisoned in the castle of Sta. Catalina, at Cadiz, confined in a dungeon with a sentinel at the door, and for several months locked up at night.

The Minister of the United States, Mr. Erving, has made strong remonstrances to the Spanish Government against these unjust and cruel persecutions of an American citizen; those remonstrances have drawn from the King an order to the council to despatch Mr. Meade's case; but there is at the same time strong reason to believe that while such an order is given to amuse the American Minister, a secret order is given to delay the decision, as the present state of the Treasury would render the payment of the money inconvenient, it being apparent that the money must be paid on the liberation of Mr. Meade.

For corroboration of the principal facts of the foregoing statement, and particularly those respecting the deposit, and the circumstances under which it was made, the President is referred to the documents herewith sent, (Nos. 1 to 7.) Copies of those relating to Mr. Erving's correspondence with the Spanish Government have also been transmitted to the Department of State at Washington.

The undersigned, in making this appeal to the President, will not presume to add a single comment, but must await the result in trembling anxiety. She cannot, however, avoid respectfully intimating a hope that, if kindly disposed to act efficiently in a case so interesting to Mr. Meade and his family, the President will adopt some other means of attaining his purpose than through the agency of Mr. Erving; it being now perfectly ascertained that the representations of that gentleman to the Spanish Government, on Mr. Meade's case, are not received with that respect, or attended to with that promptness and desire of accommodation, due to their justice, to his station and conduct, or to the character of the country he represents. On the contrary, his communications have been treated with marked disregard, or answered by trifling equivocations, inasmuch as to render his exertions, however well intended and spirited, utterly useless.

By return of post, without fail, you will please state if the deposit exists, as yet, which R. Meade made on the 19th February, 1814, of 1,050,327 reals and 20 maravedis, in virtue of a sentence of the royal tribunal of the consulado of the day prior thereto. God preserve you many years.

CADIZ, April 29, 1817.

In the moment that I received your official letter of the 22d of the present month, relative to the deposit of R. Meade, I sent a copy of said letter to the Administrator General of the Revenue of the Province, on the 28th of the same month, in consequence of all the archives corresponding to the year in which the said deposit was made existing in his department and under his control, and under this date he answered me as follows:

"GENERAL ADMINISTRATION OF THE RENTS OF THE PROVINCE.

"By the archives of judicial deposits, and corresponding to the year 1814, which exist in this Administration, it appears unquestionably that R. Meade deposited, on the 19th February of said year, in virtue of a sentence of the royal tribunal of the consulado of the day before, the sum of 1,050,327 reals of vellon and 20 maravedis; and that no sum has ever been returned, to the present day, on account of said deposit, which I beg leave to state in answer to your official letter of yesterday, in which you transmit me a copy of the letter received by you from the Treasurer General of the 22d of this month.

and which I therefore beg leave to transcribe to you, as an answer to your official letter.

Copy of an official letter addressed by Don Julian Fernandez Navarrete, Treasurer General of Spain for the year 1816, to the Prior and Consuls of the Royal Tribunal of Commerce of Cadiz, and their answer.

MADRID, November 19, 1816.

In order to answer with due or correct knowledge a certain information or request which has been demanded of me by my superiors, with the least possible delay, you will be pleased to inform me, as early as possible, whether, by order of your tribunal, R. Meade made a deposit in the treasury of royal finances, or in that of the revenue? of what amount said deposit was? if it exists at present? and whether there is any impediment to returning the same to him?

God preserve you many years.

J. F. NAVARRETE.
R. W. MEADE.

An exact copy.

[REPLY.]

CADIZ, November 29, 1816.

Under date of the 19th instant, you were pleased to say to this royal tribunal, that, in order to answer certain information which had been demanded by your superiors, this tribunal should state whether it was true that, by its order, R. Meade had made any deposit in the royal treasury of finance, or that of the revenue? of what amount it consisted? if it existed at present? and if there was any impediment to its being returned to him?

In reply to these questions the Consulado begs leave to state that, at the suit of John McDermot, who claimed from R. Meade, for balance of accounts, the sum of 1,050,327 reals of vellon and 16 maravedis: In the course of the proceedings, this tribunal gave its sentence, commanding R. Meade to deposit the aforesaid sum in the royal treasury of the revenue; and this was done in treasury notes of effective cash, which said Meade had to receive from said department; and the deposit was thus made, the treasurer obliging himself to hold the amount at the disposition of this tribunal. The sum deposited subsists; and though McDermot afterwards pretended that R. Meade should deliver him said sum, without regard to the deposit, it did not take place, on account of R. Meade having appealed. The said Meade applied to His Majesty, and, through the minister of finance, there was issued a royal order, dated 10th August 1815, in which it was commanded, that, in the mean time, that funds could be collected wherewith to return the aforesaid deposit, this tribunal should suspend its proceedings. This tribunal consulted the supreme council of war on this point, and, in virtue of a despatch, (of which the adjoined is the literal copy,) they submitted the auto or proceedings to the supreme council, as commanded by said royal order. The supreme council makes merit of the same in the aforesaid document; and it is the strongest proof that the deposit exists at the disposition of this tribunal, from the circumstance of the auto or suit being still pending in the appeal before the supreme council. This tribunal cannot resolve to whom the sum so deposited is to be returned; and, whilst the suit is dependent upon the appeal, this tribunal cannot regulate its sentence or proceedings.

Imprisonment of R. W. Meade.

MADRID, June 29, 1817.

SIR: My last note to you on the case of R. W. Meade, was on the 9th May; that representation induced your Excellency to repeat His Majesty's orders to the council of war, to the end that it might forthwith evacuate the consulta, which has been so long demanded from it. It was to be expected, in a case of this urgency, where the liberty, fortune, health, and domestic happiness of an innocent man had been wantonly sacrificed, that the tribunal would have hastened to repair the errors which it had fallen into, more particularly as, in the name of my Government, I had demanded the liberty of this individual. It was not, however, till the 26th May that the fiscal's dictamen was given; that document, after a vain attempt to justify the anterior proceeding complained of, concluded in these words: "Pero en el dice quano existe el deposito como si fuese dinero efectivo segun expone el Tesorero General y quando el Consulado asegura que preceptuó a Meade verificase el deposito en tesoreria de rentas, parece que habiendo cumplido con ambos extremos no debe continuar por mas tiempo su arresto."

The conclusion which the fiscal has thus arrived at, and the facts on which he has founded it, were as true twelve months ago as they are now. In fine, here is a confession of the fiscal himself, according to which there is no ground for continuing the imprisonment of Mr. Meade a single moment; but though the dictamen was given on the 26th of May, Mr. Meade has not been released. I therefore pray that your Excellency would be pleased to order that the council act in conformity to it, without the least delay.

I renew to your Excellency assurances of my most distinguished consideration, &c.

GEORGE W. ERVING.

The Secretary of State to Don Luis de Onis, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from Spain.

WASHINGTON, December 26, 1817.

SIR: I am directed by the President of the United States to invite your immediate attention, and to urge that of your Government, to the case of Richard W. Meade, a citizen of the United States, who has been confined since the 2d of May, 1816, in the prison of Santa Catalina, at Cadiz.

It has been repeatedly represented to your Government, by the Minister of the United States at Madrid, that the imprisonment of this person was under a sentence of a tribunal at

"But, at present, while the deposit exists as if in effective money, as set forth by the Treasurer General, and while the Consulado declares that they ordered Meade to make that deposit in the provincial treasury, it appears that, having complied with both orders, his arrest and imprisonment should not be continued any longer."

Cadiz, condemning him to pay a second time a sum of money which, by virtue of a prior decree of the same tribunal, he had already paid into the royal treasury. This fact has never been denied or contested by your Government. It has been proved to them by the attestations and certificates of their own officers.

It was to have been presumed that upon the first moment that such a fact was authentically presented to your Government, an order would instantly have issued from it for the discharge of Mr. Meade from his imprisonment. The President regrets that, after so many and such urgent representations in his behalf, by the Minister of the United States at Madrid, it should yet be necessary to address this call upon the most common principle of justice to you. I am instructed by him to say that, in renewing this demand for Mr. Meade's immediate liberation, he confidently expects it will not be in vain.

I pray you, sir, to accept, &c.

J. Q. ADAMS.

The Chevalier Don Luis de Onis to the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, December 29, 1811.

SIR: I have received your note dated the 26th of this month, in which, by order of the President, you communicate to me what appears to have taken place in Spain, in the case of a lawsuit against Richard W. Meade, a citizen of these States, in order that I should make the necessary representations on this subject to the King, my master, and solicit his release from confinement.

In compliance with the wishes of the President, and yours, sir, I shall, with great pleasure, make this request in favor of Mr. Meade, although I am not informed of the details of the suit instituted against him, nor of those which have produced his confinement.

Confiding in the just intentions of the King, and his high consideration for the United States, I must hope that His Majesty will attend efficaciously to this request, and so use his authority in having justice promptly done to Mr. Meade, that the laws may be observed with the strictest impartiality, and no motive or pretext whatever left to doubt of the immaculate (acendrada) purity which has ever been acknowledged as the particular attribute of the Spanish magistracy.

I renew my respects to you, sir, and pray God to preserve you many years.

tionly confined in a dungeon in Spain, by the authority of that Government, have given to the subject the deliberation its importance deserved, and beg leave to submit the following report:

It appears from the documents that R. W. Meade is an American citizen, who went to Spain in the year 1803 on lawful business; that, in the year 1806, such was the confidence of the Government in his integrity, that he was appointed navy agent for the United States at the port of Cadiz; a station which he held until the time of his confinement. Such was the correctness of his deportment, as to have been appointed by the tribunal of commerce at Cadiz, with the consent of all the parties concerned, assignee of a bankrupt, the amount of whose estate involved a high responsibility. He performed the duties thus devolved upon him honestly; and having collected for distribution fifty thousand dollars, he several times petitioned the tribunal to permit him to remit this sum to the creditors of the bankrupt resident in England; the only proper course left him to pursue, inasmuch as he had, when appointed agent of the bankrupt, given his bond to that tribunal conditioned to take charge of the effects of the bankrupt, and to be responsible solely to the tribunal for the proceeds, being prohibited under the penalty of the bonds from disposing of the funds without the sanction of the tribunal. A controversy having arisen between the creditors and bankrupt about the distribution, Meade offered the money to either, if they would give a bond, with surties, to the satisfaction of the tribunal of commerce, by which his own might be cancelled. This they were unable to do. The tribunal, of its own accord, and unexpectedly, decided that Meade should, on the following morning, place the money in the King's treasury until the parties litigant should give the security required; being declared that all Meade's property should be sequestered in the case of non-payment at the time limited. The money was forthwith paid by Meade into the treasury, in treasury notes equal to specie, and hence acknowledged by the Treasurer that the deposit had been made in due form, under his inspection, in effective specie; and that whenever the tribunal should order its payment, His Majesty would pay it in the same coin.

Notwithstanding this judgment, and the discharge thereof, by the payment aforesaid, Mr. McDermot, the agent for the British creditors, brought suit against Meade in the same court to recover the very sum he had heretofore paid in conformity to its own judgment. The court awarded judgment against Meade a second time for this money. The latter appealed to the superior tribunal, called alzadas. During its pendency, it is charged by Meade that the cause was removed, by the interposition of the British Minister, to the council of war; and by the same interposition his arrest and confinement were procured from which he could be relieved only by a repayment of the money. He has languished in confinement from the 2d of May, 1816, down to the last accounts from Spain. The representative of this nation at that Court has repeatedly appealed to His Catholic Majesty for the relief of Meade, and the appeal has been in vain; the Court of Spain having refused either to restore the money deposited in its own treasury, by order of its own competent judicial authority, or to release the person of Meade from the long confinement to which he has been doomed. And, finally, the President of the United States, whose peculiar province it is to take cognizance of subjects of this kind, has caused a representation on the subject to be made to the Minister of Spain to the United States, demanding his immediate liberation. Nothing but a confidence that this representation will produce the desired result would have restrained your committee from recommending the adoption of measures of severe retribution.

Your committee are of opinion that it is due to the dignity of the United States to adopt, as a fundamental rule of its policy, the principle that one of its citizens, to whatever region of the earth his lawful business may carry him, and who demeans himself as becomes his character, is entitled to the protection of his Government, and that whatever intentional injury may be done him should be retaliated by the employment, if necessary, of the whole force of the nation.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
April 4, 1818.

The committee to whom were referred a resolution of the 12th of February, and a memorial from a number of citizens of the United States, residing in the city of Philadelphia, relating to the imprisonment of Richard W. Meade, report:

That, upon an examination of the documents communicated to the House by the President, the following facts appear:

On the second day of May, 1816, Richard W. Meade, a native citizen of the United States, who has resided in Cadiz for some years past, was arrested and closely confined in the castle of St. Catalina, which is described by the Minister of the United States at the Court of Spain as a felon's prison. At the time of the arrest Mr. Meade was the navy agent of the United States at the port of Cadiz, and acted as consular agent, under an authority derived from Mr. Cathcart, the Consul of the United States at that place, and with the approbation of the Spanish authorities; Mr. Cathcart having appointed him to act in his stead, during his absence upon a visit he made to the United States. Mr. Meade does not appear to have ever renounced his character of a citizen of the United States, nor to have accepted from any foreign Power any right or privilege, nor to have contracted any obligation that could for a moment make his citizenship doubtful, or impair the claim he has upon his country for protection.

Soon after his confinement began, George W. Erving, Minister of the United States at the Court of Spain, interposed to obtain his liberation, and from the 27th of August, 1816, to the 9th of May, 1817, made repeated and earnest applications to the public functionaries of Spain, claiming his release, as a citizen of the United States unjustly deprived of his liberty. It is chiefly from this correspondence, accompanying the Message of the President, that the committee have been able to obtain any knowledge of the causes that led to Mr. Meade's arrest and imprisonment.

Imprisonment of R. W. Meade.

Mr. Meade, it seems, had been regularly appointed assignee at Cadiz of the estate of James W. Glass, declared a bankrupt in England, and in that capacity, after faithfully executing his duty, there remained in his hands a sum of about $52,000 belonging to the estate, which there is reason to believe was the subject of controversy between different claimants. There is no complaint or suggestion that Mr. Meade improperly retained this money in his hands, or was prevented from paying it over by any consideration but that of a just regard for his own security, which did not, under the then existing circumstances, permit him to part with the fund; and it seems that he could not under any circumstances pay the money, without the consent and direction of the Consulado of Cadiz.

In this state of things, on the 18th of February, 1814, the Consulado of Cadiz, a tribunal whose jurisdiction over the matter does not appear to be questioned, made a summary order, requiring Mr. Meade, within a limited and very short time, (about twenty-four hours,) to deposit the abovementioned sum of money in the treasury general of the province. With this order Mr. Meade complied on the following day. The fact of his compliance was vouched at the time by the usual and authentic evidence from the proper officer, and has since been satisfactorily established, in the manner that will hereafter appear.

The Consulado, by its own act, in taking the fund from the hands of Mr. Meade, and causing it to be deposited in the public treasury, would seem, upon every just principle, to have liberated him from further accountability. That tribunal, nevertheless, soon after entertained a new proceeding against Mr. Meade, at the instance of a certain John McDermot, the agent of Duncan Hunter, having for its object to compel him to pay to the Consulado the same amount which he had been previously ordered to pay, and, under their order, had already paid into the public treasury; that is, in substance, to pay the same sum a second time. The Consulado made a decree against him to that effect. From this decree Mr. Meade appealed to the superior tribunal of the province, called the alzadas, "but its interference was overruled by the tribunal of war at Madrid, and this latter confirmed the sentence of the Consulado at Cadiz."

On the 4th of August, 1815, a royal decree was issued, suspending the further proceedings of the Consulado against Mr. Meade, until funds could be collected by the treasury to restore the deposit made by Mr. Meade.

From the date last mentioned, (4th of August, 1815,) it does not appear that any proceedings took place until the 2d of May, 1816, when the tribunal of war issued the order under which Mr. Meade was arrested and continues to be imprisoned.

This order was founded upon a suggestion made by McDermot, that Mr. Meade was about to leave the Kingdom, and required him to "deliver up the aforesaid deposit, (meaning the money belonging to the bankrupt's estate,) in like manner, and in the same specie, as he had received it, or to give full, clear, and sufficient security, to the satisfaction of the tribunal of commerce at Cadiz; and, in default thereof, to be removed to a public prison, to prevent all evasion of the sentence against him." It is understood that the tribunal would receive nothing as satisfactory security but a deposit of specie.

The proceeding of the tribunal of war is apparently so destitute of all foundation in justice, and so plainly contradictory to the royal decree of the 4th August, 1815, that it becomes necessary to examine, for a moment, the only suggestion bearing the semblance of a vindication of it that has been offered on the part of the Spanish authorities.

Don Pedro Cevallos, in his note to Mr. Erving of the 10th September, 1816, alleges "that Mr. Meade attempted to restore (alluding to the payment into the Treasury) the money demanded of him, in credits of the Treasury." The precise import of this allegation may be understood to be, that Mr. Meade had made the deposit in Government paper, instead of making it in specie.

That Mr. Meade made the deposit in what was equivalent to specie, and was received as such by the officer authorized to receive it, is perfectly clear. The Intendant of the Treasury gave him a receipt for the deposit, made pursuant to the order of the Consulado. In answer to an inquiry soon after directed by the Consulado, the same officer replied, that the deposit had been made in effective specie, and that he would respond for the specie. The royal order, or decree, of the 4th August, 1815, is founded upon the admission of the same fact. But there is still further evidence, though further evidence would seem to be unnecessary. In November, 1816, the Treasurer General of Spain distinctly put the questions to the Consulado, whether the deposit had been made? whether it still existed? and whether there was any impediment to its return? That tribunal, with equal distinctness, replied, that the deposit was made, pursuant to their order, "in Treasury notes of effective cash, which said Meade had to receive from said Department, and the deposit was thus made: the Treasurer obliging himself to hold the amount at the disposition of this tribunal." They state, also, that the deposit still exists at their disposition, and that they cannot resolve to whom it is to be returned. And, again, on the 29th April, 1817, the treasurer of the revenue, or provincial rents of Cadiz, states explicitly to the Treasurer General of Spain, that the deposit had been made, and had not been returned.

With such an accumulation of evidence from sources of unquestionable authenticity, and wholly uncontradicted, to show that the deposit had been made in what was equivalent to specie, and received as specie, and that the Treasury became, and acknowledged itself to be, answerable for the amount, it is almost superfluous to add a remark, which the course of the business very naturally presents, tending to the same result. If the order made by the Consulado in the first instance had not been complied with, that tribunal would have proceeded to enforce its authority by summary and direct compulsion; in other words, it would have used the means with which it is invested by law to compel Mr. Meade to do exactly what that order required. This would have produced an immediate inquiry whether he had or had not complied, and would have enabled Mr. Meade to justify himself. The resort to an irregular and arbitrary course, which avoids that question, affords the strongest reason to believe that the allegation of Mr. Cevallos was known to be untenable. In fact, that allegation has since been wholly abandoned; for, in the three notes subsequently addressed to Mr. Erving, in reply to his urgent remonstrances, one by Mr. Cevallos, and two by his successor, Mr. Pizarro, it is not even alluded to.

It is impossible, however, to avoid remarking the extraordinary character of one of the questions put to the Consulado in November, 1816, and the still more extraordinary character of the answer. The inquiry alluded to was, whether there was any impediment to its (the deposit) being returned? The answer is, that, from the circumstances of the suit still pending, this tribunal cannot resolve to whom the sum so deposited is to be returned. Why Mr. Meade should be imprisoned pending that suit, which was to determine to whom the money in the Treasury was to be paid, is a question that seems to admit of no answer that is reconcilable with common justice, more especially as the same document implies that the Treasury was to pay the money as soon as the suit should be decided, and, of course, the object of the suit was not to coerce Mr. Meade to pay, but simply to determine who was to have the money from the Treasury.

There is still another view of this matter which the committee think it proper to submit, and which they deem of itself decisive to establish the flagrant injustice of Mr. Meade's imprisonment. If the deposit was made in paper, it is beyond a doubt that the paper was the evidence of a debt due from the Treasury to Mr. Meade, and the receipt of it amounted to nothing more than a payment of what was justly due to him; in fact, it was the same thing as if the Treasury had paid him the money, and he had immediately after repaid the same money to the Treasury. The Treasury, therefore, had no just cause to complain. It is equally evident that the individual interested in the deposit (Mr. McDermot, or his constituent) had no reason to complain. Whether the deposit was made in specie, or in what was equivalent to specie, or how it was made, could not be material to him, provided it was so made as to give him a right to call upon the Treasury; that is, to make him a creditor of the Treasury for the amount, in case of an eventual decision in his favor. That this was the effect of the deposit made by Mr. Meade, and received by the Treasurer, is not, and cannot be disputed. The Treasurer cancelled the securities deposited, and engaged to respond for the amount in specie.

If the Treasury of Spain had been ready and willing to fulfil this engagement, Mr. Meade's imprisonment could not have continued for a single moment; and it is, therefore, evident that he is kept in confinement simply because it is not convenient for the treasury to pay the money. And your committee are well assured that the Government of Spain, aware that, let the decision be what it might, the royal treasury would be called on to pay money in dispute, has, by a secret exertion of the authority which it possesses over the proceedings of the tribunals, commanded "the business to be prolonged as much as possible."

In every point of view, then, in which the case can be considered, your committee can discover no justification for the imprisonment and sufferings of Mr. Meade. It does not appear that he has violated any civil or social duty which he owed by the laws of Spain, and for which, in the ordinary administration of justice, he might rightly be imprisoned. They are satisfied, too, that the continuance of his imprisonment is dependent upon the pleasure of the Government of Spain, and that his liberation may at any time be effected by that Government.

Your committee hope and believe that the demand made by the President will not be unavailing, but they think it proper, at the same time, on the part of this House, to give assurance of support in the measures that may become necessary, in case this expectation should be disappointed. They, therefore, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House is satisfied that the imprisonment of Richard W. Meade is an act of cruel and unjustifiable oppression: that it is the right and duty of the Government of the United States to afford to Mr. Meade its aid and protection; and that this House will support and maintain such measures as the President may hereafter adopt to obtain the release of the said R. W. Meade from confinement, should such measures be proper and necessary.

SPAIN—BLOCKADES.

[Communicated to the House, February 17, 1818.]
To the House of Representatives of the United States:
Conformably with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 6th of this month, I now lay before that House a report received from the Secretary of State, with a copy of the correspondence referred to, and requested by that resolution.

JAMES MONROE.

FEBRUARY 12, 1818.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Feb. 12, 1818.

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 6th of this month, requesting the President to cause to be laid before that House the correspondence with the Government of Spain, to which a letter of the Minister of the United States at the Court of Madrid, of the 25th of October, 1816, communicated with a late message of the President to that House, relates, has the honor, herewith, to submit to the President a copy of the correspondence requested.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

PHILADELPHIA, September 5, 1815.

SIR: Under the date of 30th June, I am advised by Lieutenant General Don Pablo Morillo, Captain General of Caraccas, and commander of the expedition which His Majesty has destined to re-establish tranquillity at Carthagena, that, with a view to accelerate this important object, he is about to establish the most rigorous blockade of the ports of the viceroyalty of Santa Fe, including Carthagena, and that, in consequence, every neutral vessel which shall be found, not only in those ports, but on those coasts, shall be made prize of, in order to prevent those who have revolted from His Majesty's authority receiving succors of any kind.

I have thought it proper to communicate this to you, for the information of the President, that the injuries may be avoided which would result to the citizens of this Republic, if they continue, as heretofore, to trade with the rebels against the authority of my sovereign.

I renew to you, &amp;c.

LUIS DE ONIS.

PHILADELPHIA, March 2, 1816.

SIR: Don Pablo Morillo, Commander-in-Chief of the forces destined by the King, my master, for the pacification of the viceroyalty of Santa Fe, says to me, under date of the 19th of December last, that, after having compelled Carthagena to surrender at discretion, he had found it expedient, for the complete re-establishment of the tranquillity of the viceroyalty, to continue the blockade from Santa Marta to the river Atrato, inclusive; and to give orders that if any vessel be met with further south than the mouths of the Magdalena, or further north than the parallel of Cape Tiburon, on the Mosquito shore, and between the meridians of those points, she would be declared a good prize, whatever documents or destination she might have; but that he had left open to the commerce of neutrals the two ports of Santa Marta and Porto Bello.

I have the honor to give you this notice, as it may be interesting to the merchants of the United States, and to renew the assurances, &c.

LUIS DE ONIS.

MARCH 20, 1816.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of March 2, announcing the continuance of a blockade of the Spanish coast in South America, from Santa Marta to the river Atrato, inclusive of the latter, by the Commander-in-Chief of His Catholic Majesty's forces; and that if any vessel is met south of the mouths of the Magdalena, or north of the parallel of Cape Tiburon, on the Mosquito coast, and between the meridian of those points, she shall be seized and condemned as prize, whatever may be her documents or destination. You state, also, that the ports of Santa Marta and Porto Bello are left open to neutrals.

I have to state that this proclamation of General Morillo is evidently repugnant to the law of nations, for several reasons, particularly the following: that it declares a coast of several hundred miles to be in a state of blockade; and because it authorizes the seizure of neutral vessels at an unjustifiable distance from the coast. No maxim of the law of nations is better established than that a blockade shall be confined to particular ports, and that an adequate force shall be stationed at each to support it. The force shall be stationary, and not a cruising squadron, and placed so near the entrance of the harbor or mouth of the river as to make it evidently dangerous for a vessel to enter. I have to add, that a vessel entering the port ought not to be seized, except in returning to it after being warned off by the blockading squadron stationed near it.

I am instructed by the President to state to you these objections to the blockade which has been announced in your letter, that you may communicate them to your Government, and in confidence that you will, in the mean time, interpose your good offices, and prevail on General Morillo to alter his proclamation, and practice under it, in such a manner as to conform, in both respects, to the law of nations.

In stating to you these well-founded objections to the blockade of General Morillo, I have the honor to observe that your motive for communicating it is duly appreciated.

I have the honor to be, &amp;c.

JAMES MONROE.

Don Luis de Onis to the Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, March 25, 1816.

SIR: I have received your official letter of the 20th of this month, in which you state that the proclamation of General Morillo is repugnant to the laws of nations, as well because it declares a coast of several hundred miles in a state of blockade, authorizing the capture of every neutral vessel at an unlimited distance from the coast, as that it is an established maxim among nations that a blockade should be limited to the ports where there may be a stationary and not a cruising force sufficient to make the entrance of the harbor or river where it may be placed dangerous; and, finally, even in this case, a vessel ought not to be captured when she is about to enter a port, save only when, after having received notice of the blockade, she attempts to infringe it. You are pleased to state to me that the President desires that I will communicate these observations to my Government, and that I would use my good offices, confidentially, with General Morillo, so to modify his blockade as to make it conform to the laws of nations.

I will communicate to His Majesty, in compliance with the wishes of the President, what you have stated to me in your note; and I will, with pleasure, avail myself of the departure of Mr. Hughes to write to General Morillo, inviting him, in the execution of his blockade, to avoid the injurious effects resulting therefrom to the citizens of this Republic, so far as may be compatible with the security and tranquillity of His Majesty's dominions under his command.

I must, however, observe to you, sir, that General Morillo has a naval force disposable and competent as I conceive, to the object in view; that, on the 3d of February, there sailed from Cadiz a squadron of a ship-of-the-line, two frigates, and several smaller vessels, as a reinforcement; that, on the coast intended to be blockaded by the said General, there are no other ports of entry for merchant vessels than those of Carthagena, Santa Marta, and Porto Bello; and, finally, that the measure taken by him, not being directed against an enemy's country, is not, as stated in your esteemed note, contrary to the laws of public rights. The object of the General's proclamation is to notify the traders of foreign nations that he will maintain the laws for the regulation of the Indies in their full force; the observance of which had been relaxed, in latter times, by the effect of circumstances, though modified, however, in favor of neutrals, by leaving two ports open to their commerce. You are aware that, agreeably to those laws, no foreign vessel was allowed to trade with the dominions of His Majesty on that continent, without a special license, and that vessels found near, or evidently shaping a course towards them, were liable to confiscation as interlopers. Not only that part of the coast lying between Santa Marta and the river Atrato, but the whole coast eastward and southward of those points, from the Orinoco to the territory of this Republic, belongs to the Spanish monarchy; and, consequently, any vessel whatever found near it, or standing towards it, can have no other object than to carry on smuggling, or stir up a civil war in the King's dominions: in either case, the laws of nations recommend the seizure of the vessels so employed. Actuated by a constant desire to prevent the misfortunes which such injuries might occasion to the citizens of this Republic, I have, on other occasions, suggested a very simple mode of putting an end to them, namely, that the President would be pleased to issue orders that no vessel should be cleared at the custom-houses save for a specified port, according to the general practice of nations. The practice of clearing many vessels for the West Indies, generally, carries with it a suspicion of a design to carry on a contraband trade, or to disturb the public tranquillity in the dominions of the King, my master; and, therefore, the owner who clears out his vessel in this way, and without the certificates of the Spanish Consuls, cannot complain if it be detained as suspicious. In fact, what difficulty can a merchant, acting fairly, have to specify the port of Havana, Kingston, Santa Marta, Guaira, Porto Bello, Rio Janeiro, or any other of an independent nation? None, unquestionably; since, in case of not finding a good market at one place, he proceeds to another, with a declaration made at the port he touched at of the motives which obliged him to alter his destination. The wisdom and humanity which eminently distinguish the President and the Administration cannot fail to perceive the solidity of these observations, nor to approve of the policy of His Majesty in taking the most suitable and effectual measures to secure his subjects from the civil war which a number of adventurers are endeavoring to kindle in his dominions; and I therefore flatter myself that he will be pleased to take into consideration the expediency of adopting the measure I have had the honor to suggest to you, by preventing the collectors of the customs from clearing out vessels, except for specified ports, and notifying merchants trading with the possessions of the King to conform to the established rules and orders, regulating not only neutrals but Spanish vessels also, that they may avoid the consequences of their non-observance, notwithstanding His Majesty's desire to afford them, within his dominions, all the benefits and advantages compatible with the public safety and his royal interests.

I hope that the explanation which I have thus taken the liberty to make, until I have received the answer of the King, my master, will quiet the anxiety of the President as to the proclamation of General Morillo, and that it will be viewed by him as a continuation of my earnest desire to reinstate the commerce of the two nations, reciprocally, on the most liberal and favorable footing.

I renew my respects, &c.

LUIS DE ONIS.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Erving, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 20, 1816.

You have been apprized already of a similar measure which was taken in regard to the vessels which had been seized at Carthagena, and the citizens of the United States, who, under various pretenses, had been arrested and imprisoned there. I have the pleasure to state that the application succeeded as to our citizens, though it failed as to the vessels. You will interpose directly with the Spanish Government in favor of the latter; documents respecting which shall be forwarded to you, either by the present or some other early opportunity.

MADRID, Sept. 26, 1816.

SIR: I am ordered by my Government to apply to His Majesty, through your Excellency, for the restitution of sundry American vessels and cargoes which have been seized and brought into Carthagena, or other places within that command or viceroyalty, under pretext of a pretended blockade, issued by Don Pablo Morillo, in December, 1815.

When that blockade was communicated to the American Government, Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, in a note of March 20, 1816, addressed to His Majesty's Minister at Washington, formally protested against it; and it was hoped that, on proper representations being made by that Minister to General Morillo, he would retract his measure, or, if not, that his Majesty, being made acquainted with the remonstrance of the American Government, would immediately send out orders which might produce the same effect, and assure for the future due liberty to the American commerce in those seas.

But it now appears that, as late as the month of June, no alteration had taken place in the measures of Morillo; no attention had been paid to the interference of Don Luis de Onis; and, finally, the Commissioner, Mr. Hughes, who was sent by the Government of the United States to Carthagena, for the purpose, amongst others, of reclaiming the property seized, was obliged to return to the United States, on that point altogether unsatisfied. Indeed, the Viceroy of Santa Fe, Don Francisco de Montalvo, gives this Commissioner to understand, by a letter of June 9th, whereof the enclosed is a translated copy, that he (the Viceroy) does not pretend to be acquainted with the law of nations; and, at the same time that he goes on executing the arbitrary and illegal decrees of General Morillo, devastating the commerce of the United States, he refers the American Government to His Majesty for redress.

It is therefore that I now find it necessary to write to your Excellency upon this disagreeable subject.

It is in vain, sir, to hope that the United States will ever consent to blockades upon the principles of General Morillo; they will acknowledge none to be valid which are not strictly conformable to the well-known principles of public law—principles most clearly defined and quite indisputable, to which the United States have always adhered in their own practice, and to the infringement of which, in any form, in any degree, or under whatever pretext, they have always opposed themselves.

The blockade of General Morillo is repugnant to the law, because it extends over several hundred miles of coast, and to an indefinite distance from the shores; of course it cannot be enforced as a blockade, but remains a bare pretext for spoliation. A blockade by sea, to be acknowledged as valid by the United States, must be confined to particular ports, each having a force stationed before it, sufficient to intercept the entry of vessels; and no vessel shall be seized, even in attempting to enter a port so blockaded, till she has been previously warned away from that port.

I may be excused from dilating on rules so perfectly established, so consonant to justice and to reason, in writing to a person of your Excellency's knowledge and experience.

His Majesty, who does not fail, through his Minister, Mr. Onis, to assure the United States of his constant disposition to cultivate relations of friendship with them, and to that end to satisfy all their just reclamations, will certainly be sensible to the violent proceedings of which my Government now complains, and, I persuade myself, will not hesitate in ordering that the proclamation of embargo issued by General Morillo be declared null, and that all the American property which may have been taken under it be immediately restored to its owners.

In this confidence, I annex hereto a list of the vessels already known to have been captured.

Renewing to your Excellency, &c.

GEORGE W. ERVING.

Schooner Adeline, of Baltimore, at Carthagena; Friend's Hope, of Baltimore, at Carthagena; schooner Count, of Baltimore, at Carthagena; Charles Stewart, of New Orleans, at Santa Marta; Edward Graham, at Santa Margarita; Ghent, of Norfolk, at Puerto Cavello.

N. B. It is believed that the cargoes of several of these vessels have been confiscated without even the form of trial.

OCTOBER 17, 1816.

SIR: Having communicated to the King your note of the 26th ultimo on the subject of the seizure of several American vessels in the port of Carthagena, South America, in consequence of the blockade established on those coasts by General Morillo, and your demand of their restitution, His Majesty has been pleased to determine that information shall be requested (se pida informe) of the court of admiralty on this business.

I renew to you the assurances, &c.

PEDRO CEVALLOS.

Mr. Erving to Mr. Cevallos.

MADRID, October 25, 1816.

SIR: By your Excellency's note of the 17th instant, in reply to mine of September 26, respecting the proclamation blockade of General Mo-rillo, and the ravages on the American commerce which are committing under it, I am told that His Majesty has ordered that information shall be taken (se pida informe) of the tribunal of admiralty.

That General Morillo has issued such a proclamation as I have described in my note of September 26, is a fact of universal notoriety. Your Excellency has had before you, long since, the correspondence between the American Secretary of State and Mr. Onís on the subject, and I have transmitted to you a copy of the letter of Don Francisco Montalvo, Viceroy of Santa Fe, to the American Commissioner, Mr. Hughes, in which the existence of the blockade is admitted, and in which the American Government is referred for redress to His Catholic Majesty. It was, therefore, that, by the orders of my Government, I wrote to you on the subject. With the fact which I have above stated before you, I am wholly at a loss to imagine what kind of information the tribunal of admiralty can afford which may regulate the decision of His Majesty on the subject.

The tribunal cannot deny the existence of the proclamation; it cannot show that the proclamation is legal; it cannot deny that American vessels have been taken under the proclamation; it cannot contest the right of the American Government to demand the restitution of such vessels.

In fine, sir, it is my duty to assure you that any demur or delay in affording the satisfaction demanded, in a case of this principal importance, cannot but be very sensibly felt by the Government of the United States. I renew, &c.

GEORGE W. ERVING.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Erving to the Secretary of State, dated MADRID, December 15, 1816.

I had the honor, by my letter (of October 27,) to communicate to you the continuation of my correspondence with Mr. Cevallos on various subjects; and by that of October 31st, (No. 24,) to inform you that he had been dismissed from his employments, and succeeded in them by Don José Pizarro.

I herewith submit to you copies of my correspondence with this new Minister.

He has not replied to my note of the 25th October, respecting Morillo's blockade proclamation.

Don Luis de Onís to the Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, October 26, 1816.

Sir: His Excellency the Viceroy of the Kingdom of New Granada communicates to me, under date of the 2d of September last, that tranquillity being restored throughout the whole Kingdom of Santa Fe, and all its provinces having submitted to his Majesty's Government, the commander-in-chief, Don Pablo Morillo, has thought fit to raise the blockade which he had established on those coasts, the causes having ceased which obliged him to impose it; and that, in consequence of this determination, the before-mentioned Viceroy has been pleased to open the provinces of that Kingdom, and particularly the port of Cartagena, to the commerce of the Powers in amity with His Majesty, under the regulations specified in the printed papers which I have the honor to transmit herewith.

I hope, sir, that you will be pleased to bring this to the knowledge of the President, that he may see the disposition of His Majesty to favor the commerce of this Republic in everything that may be compatible with the security of his dominions, and that comports with his interests.

I renew my respects, &c.

LUIS DE ONÍS.

On this affair [proclamation of Morillo] I wrote on the 26th September, 1816, and was answered October 17th that an "informe" should be taken of the almirantazgo; I wrote again on the 25th October, and remain without any answer.

KINGDOM OF SICILY.

[Communicated to the House, March 2, 1818.]

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I lay before the House a report from the Secretary of State, together with the papers relating to claims of merchants of the United States upon the Government of Naples, in conformity with a resolution of the House of the 30th of January last.

JAMES MONROE.

FEBRUARY 28, 1818.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Feb. 27, 1818.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 30th of January last, requesting such information possessed by the Executive, as may be communicated without injury to the public interest, relative to the claims of merchants of the United States for their property seized and confiscated under the authority of the King of Naples, has the honor of submitting to the President the papers in the possession of this Department concerning that subject.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 11, 1816.

Being appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the Emperor of Russia, and in a similar trust to the King of Naples, the duties of the latter mission, which is special, will engage your attention in the first instance. The Washington, a ship-of-the line, is ordered into the Chesapeake to receive on board and to convey you and your family to Naples. You will be furnished with the usual commission and letter of credence to the King.

A principal object of your mission to Naples is to obtain indemnity for the losses which our citizens sustained by the illegal seizure and confiscation of their property by the Neapolitan Government. You will be furnished with such evidence in support of the claim as is in possession of this Department; and as notice has been given to the collectors in the principal cities of your appointment and its object, that it might be communicated to the parties interested, it is expected that you will receive much further light on the subject directly from them.

The President does not entertain a doubt of the right of the United States to a full indemnity for these losses. They were inflicted by the then Government of the country without the slightest cause. The commerce of the United States was invited into the Neapolitan ports by special decrees, with the promise of protection and encouragement; on the faith of which many ships having entered with valuable cargoes, the whole amount was seized by the Government itself, and converted to public use. For this very extraordinary and unlawful act no plea has been urged that we have heard of, except that of necessity, which is no argument against indemnity. The injury being inflicted by a Government in full possession of the sovereignty of the country, exercising all its powers, recognised by the nation and by foreign Powers, by treaties and by other formal acts of the highest authority, it is not perceived on what ground an indemnity can be refused. No principle is better established than that the nation is responsible for the acts of its Government, and that a change in the authority does not affect the obligation. In the disordered state of that country for several years past, it has been thought useless to press this claim; but now that affairs appear to be better settled, it would be improper longer to delay it. The President indulges a strong hope that reparation will now be made. In the discharge of this trust, in the manner of the negotiation, and in the provision for the debt, should such be made, you will manifest a spirit of conciliation towards the Government of Naples. Any reasonable accommodation as to the time and the mode of payment which may be desired will be cheerfully allowed.

As you will be well acquainted with the nature of these claims, and the right of the United States to an indemnity, with the principles on which it is founded, and the arguments and facts which support it, it is unnecessary for me to enter further into the subject. The President has full confidence that nothing will be wanting on your part to secure success to the mission. Satisfied that you will discharge its duties with equal ability and discretion, it is thought improper, by too much precision, to impose any restraint on your judgment, either as to the manner or the argument to be used in the negotiation.

Your mission to Naples being special, its object limited, and being likewise anticipated by the Neapolitan Government, it is expected that it may be concluded in a few interviews. It is very important that the United States should be represented at St. Petersburg by a Minister of the highest grade employed by them, without any delay which can be avoided. The President desires, therefore, that you will use every effort in your power to terminate the business with Naples as soon as it may be possible, and that you will proceed thence, immediately afterwards, to St. Petersburg.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Pinkney, Minister at Naples, to Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, dated

NAPLES, August 29, 1816.

On Saturday, the 27th, I prepared an official note to the Marquis di Circello, announcing my quality of Envoy Extraordinary to the King.

His answer (appointing Wednesday, the 31st, for our interview) was sent immediately.

My reception on the 31st was extremely friendly, and in the highest degree respectful to the Government of the United States. The regular purpose of my visit was to show my credentials, furnish a copy, and arrange the customary audience. I did not, therefore, suppose that it presented a suitable opportunity for introducing a very detailed explanation of the objects of my mission; but, in conformity with a desire expressed by the Marquis himself, I stated them to him as fully as was necessary to enable him to communicate them to the King.

Although the Marquis di Circello was, as you know, for several years the Minister of this Court in London, he does not speak a word of English, and does not understand it when it is spoken by others. Our conversation was, therefore, in French. Amid a good deal of well-managed discourse on his part, which rather related to me than to my mission, he made several observations which had a bearing upon my principal errand. He spoke of the poverty of their public treasury in terms somewhat more strong than I was prepared to expect; of the unprincipled manner in which Monsieur Murat (as he styled him) appropriated to his own use whatever of value he could lay his hands upon, and, in particular, the vessels and merchandise belonging to our citizens; of the prodigality with which he dried up all the usual resources of the country, and dissipated, moreover, all the means which rapacity afforded. He drew no very precise conclusion from those and similar remarks, although I took such notice of them as their tendency prescribed; but, upon the whole, it was evident that the claim which I was charged to make in behalf of our merchants was not likely to be very readily admitted, and that I should only waste my time by talking over its merits from day to day with a Minister who could of himself decide nothing, and whose report of my statements and arguments to those who must make or greatly influence the final decision would not be the most advantageous channel by which they might be communicated. In consequence, before the interview was closed, I determined to prefer the claim as soon as possible in an official note, and in the meantime to forbear to urge it in conversation with any other view than to obtain from the Marquis di Circello such intimations as might be useful to me in the preparation of my paper.

On Sunday, the 11th, I had another interview with the Marquis di Circello, to which Mr. King accompanied me.

I then adverted to the principal object of my mission, and intimated that I should very soon send him a note upon it. To my surprise, he professed not to understand to what I alluded as the principal object of my mission; but, when I mentioned the spoliation by Murat, he seemed suddenly to remember that I had at least talked to him of them before, and immediately, without giving me time to proceed, remarked that he would relate to me frankly all that the present Government had been able to discover respecting them. He said that Murat's conduct in that affair appeared to be so bad that nothing could be worse, and that it amounted to a downright robbery; that it appeared that the proceeds of the sales had been ordered by Murat into the public treasury, but that a few months afterwards he took them out again, and they knew not what he had done with them. To all this I thought it sufficient to answer, that, whatever might have become of these proceeds, I hoped the King would cause our merchants to be indemnified for the loss of them; but that I had no desire at this interview to do more than inform the Marquis di Circello that I believed it would be as well to present the whole of that subject to him without delay in a note, to which I flattered myself I should have such a reply, in writing, as would be satisfactory to my Government. Without either admitting or denying the responsibility of his Government, he said that such a course would be acceptable to him, and proper in itself, and that his answer should not be unnecessarily postponed. His manner, while this topic was under notice, was kind, and even good humored; although he could not, perhaps did not wish to disguise that it was by no means a pleasant one.

On the 28th instant (yesterday morning) I sent in my note upon Murat's confiscations. The necessity of making some previous inquiries here, upon matters connected with them, had a little retarded the completion of the note, and, after it was ready, I concluded that I should lose nothing by withholding it for a few days, especially as the Marquis di Circello was incapable of attending to business, and had so informed me.

What will be the answer to the note, it is impossible to conjecture with anything like certainty. It may be such as to make it necessary for me to reply to it; but the President may be assured that my further stay in Naples shall be as short as I can make it.

NAPLES, August 24, 1816.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary of the United States of America, has already had the honor to mention to his Excellency the Marquis di Circello, Secretary of State and Minister for Foreign Affairs of His Majesty the King of the Two Sicilies, the principal objects of his mission; and he now invites his Excellency's attention to a more detailed and formal exposition of one of those objects.

The undersigned is sure that the appeal which he is about to make to the well-known justice of His Sicilian Majesty, in the name and by the orders of his Government, will receive a deliberate and candid consideration; and that if it shall appear, as he trusts it will, to be recommended by those principles which it is the interest as well as the duty of all Governments to observe and maintain, the claim involved in it will be admitted, effectually and promptly.

The undersigned did but obey the instructions of the President of the United States when he assured his Excellency the Marquis di Circello, at their first interview, that his mission was suggested by such sentiments towards His Sicilian Majesty as could not fail to be approved by him. Those sentiments are apparent in the desire which the President has manifested, through the undersigned, that the commercial relations between the territories of His Majesty and those of the United States should be cherished by reciprocal arrangements, sought in the spirit of enlightened friendship, and with a sincere view to such equal advantages as it is fit for nations to derive from one another. The representations which the undersigned is commanded to make upon the subject of the present note will be seen by His Majesty in the same light. They show the firm reliance of the President upon the disposition of the Court of Naples impartially to discuss and ascertain, and faithfully to discharge its obligations towards foreign States and their citizens; a reliance which the undersigned partakes with his Government, and under the influence of which he proceeds to state the nature and grounds of the reclamation in question.

It cannot but be known to his excellency the Marquis di Circello, that, on the first of July, 1809, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the then Government of Naples addressed to Frederick Degan, Esquire, then Consul of the United States, an official letter, containing an invitation to all American vessels, having on board the usual certificates of origin, and other regular papers, to come direct to Naples with their cargoes, and that the same Minister caused that invitation to be published in every possible mode, in order that it might come to the knowledge of those whom it concerned. It will not be questioned that the promise of security necessarily implied in this measure had every title, in the actual circumstances of Europe, to the confidence of distant and peaceful merchants. The merchants of America, as was to have been expected, did conside. Upon the credit, and under the protection of that promise, they sent to Naples many valuable vessels and cargoes, navigated and documented with scrupulous regularity, and in no respect obnoxious to molestation; but scarcely had they reached the destination to which they had been allured, when they were seized, without distinction, as prizes, or as otherwise forfeited to the Neapolitan Government, upon pretexts the most frivolous and idle. These arbitrary seizures were followed, with a rapacious haste, by summary decrees, confiscating, in the name and for the use of the same Government, the whole of the property which had thus been brought within its grasp; and these decrees, which wanted even the decent affectation of justice, were immediately carried into execution, against all the remonstrances of those whom they oppressed, to enrich the treasury of the State.

The undersigned persuades himself that it is not in a note addressed to the Marquis di Circello that it is necessary to enlarge upon the singularly atrocious character of this procedure, for which no apology can be devised, and for which none that is intelligible has hitherto been attempted. It was, indeed, an undisguised abuse of power, of which nothing could well enhance the deformity but the studied deception that preceded and prepared it; a deception which, by a sort of treason against society, converted a proffer of hospitality into a snare, and that salutary confidence, without which nations and men must cease to have intercourse, into an engine of plunder.

The right of the innocent victims of this unequalled act of fraud and rapine to demand retribution cannot be doubted. The only question is, from whom are they entitled to demand it? Those who at that moment ruled in Naples, and were in fact, and in the view of the world, the Government of Naples, have passed away before retribution could be obtained, although not before it was required; and, if the right to retribution regards only the persons of those rulers as private and ordinary wrongdoers, the American merchant, whom they deluded and despoiled in the garb and with the instruments and for the purposes of sovereignty, must despair forever of redress.

The undersigned presumes that such is not the view which the present Government will feel itself justified in taking of this interesting subject. He trusts that it will, on the contrary, perceive that the claim which the injured merchant was authorized to prefer against the Government of this country before the recent change, and which, but for that change, must sooner or later have been successful, is now a valid claim against the Government of the same country, notwithstanding that change; at least the undersigned is not at present aware of any considerations which, applied to the facts that characterize this case, can lead to a different conclusion; and certainly it would be matter for sincere regret that any consideration should be thought sufficient to make the return of His Sicilian Majesty's power fatal to the rights of friendly strangers, to whom no fault can be ascribed.

The general principle, that a civil society may contract obligations through its actual Government, whatever that may be, and that it is not absolved from them by reason simply of a change of government, or of rulers, is universally received as incontrovertible. It is admitted, not merely by writers on public law, as a speculative truth, but by States and statesmen, as a practical rule; and, accordingly, history is full of examples to prove that the undisturbed possessor of sovereign power in any society, whether a rightful possessor or not with reference to other claimants of that power, may not only be the lawful object of allegiance, but by many of his acts, in his quality of sovereign de facto, may bind the society, and those who come after him as rulers, although their title be adversary to, or even better than his own. The Marquis di Circello does not need to be informed that the earlier annals of England, in particular, abound in instructions upon this head.

With regard to just and beneficial contracts entered into by such a sovereign with the merchants of foreign nations, or (which is the same thing) with regard to the detention and confiscation of their property for public uses, and by his authority, in direct violation of a pledge of safety, upon the faith of which that property arrived within the reach of confiscation, this continuing responsibility stands upon the plainest foundations of natural equity.

It will not be pretended that a merchant is called upon to investigate, as he prosecutes his traffic, the title of every sovereign with whose ports, and under the guaranty of whose plighted word, he trades. He is rarely competent. There are few in any station who are competent to an investigation so full of delicacy, so perplexed with facts and principles of a peculiar character, far removed from the common concerns of life. His predicament would be to the last degree calamitous, if, in an honest search after commercial profit, he might not take Governments as he finds them, and, consequently, rely at all times upon visible, exclusive, acknowledged possession of supreme authority. If he sees all the usual indications of established rule, all the distinguishing concomitants of real, undisputed power, it cannot be that he is, at his peril, to discuss mysterious theories above his capacity, or foreign to his pursuits; and, moreover, to connect the results of those speculations with events of which his knowledge is either imperfect or erroneous. If he sees the obedience of the people, and the acquiescence of neighboring princes, it is impossible that it can be his duty to examine, before he ships his merchandise, whether it be fit that these should acquiesce or those obey. If, in short, he finds nothing to interfere with or qualify the dominion which the head of the society exercises over it and the domain which it occupies, it is the dictate of reason, sanctioned by all experience, that he is bound to look no further.

It can be of no importance to him that, notwithstanding all these appearances announcing lawful rule, the mere right to fill the Throne is claimed by or even resides in another than the actual occupant. The latent right, (supposing it to exist,) disjoined from and controverted by the fact, is to him nothing while it continues to be latent. It is only the sovereign in possession that it is in his power to know. It is with him only that he can enter into engagements. It is through him only that he can deal with the society. And if it be true that the sovereign in possession is incapable, on account of a conflict of title between him and another, who barely claims, but makes no effort to assert his claim, of pledging the public faith of the society and of the monarch to foreign traders, for commercial and other objects, we are driven to the monstrous conclusion that the society is, in effect and indefinitely, cut off from all communication with the rest of the world. It has and can have no organ by which it can become accountable to or make any contract with foreigners, by which needful supplies may be invited into its harbors, by which famine may be averted, or redundant productions be made to find a market in the wants of strangers. It is, in a word, an outcast from the bosom of the great community of nations, at the very moment too when its existence, in the form which it has assumed, may everywhere be admitted. And, even if the dormant claim to the Throne should at last, by a fortunate coincidence of circumstances, become triumphant, and unite itself to the possession, this harsh and palsyng theory has no assurance to give, either to the society or to those who may incline to deal with it, that its moral capacity is restored—that it is an outcast no longer—and that it may now, through the protecting will of its new sovereign, do what it could not do before. It contains, of course, no adequate and certain provision against even the perpetuity of the dilemma which it creates. If therefore a civil society is not competent, by rulers in entire possession of the sovereignty, to enter into all such promises to the members of other societies as necessity or convenience may require, and to remain unanswerable for the breach of them into whatever shape the society may ultimately be cast, or into whatsoever hands the Government may ultimately fall; if a sovereign entirely in possession is not able, for that reason alone, to incur a just responsibility in his political or corporate character to the citizens of other countries, and to transmit that responsibility even to those who succeed him by displacing him, it will be difficult to show that the moral capacity of a civil society is anything but a name, or the responsibility of sovereigns anything but a shadow. And here the undersigned will take the liberty to suggest, that it is scarcely for the interest of sovereigns to inculcate as a maxim that their lost dominions can only be recovered at the expense of the offending citizens of States in amity, or, which is equivalent to it, to make that recovery the practical consummation of intermediate justice, by utterly extinguishing the hope of indemnity, and even the title to demand it.

The undersigned will now, for the sake of perspicuity and precision, recall to the recollection of his Excellency, the Marquis di Circello, the situation of the Government of Murat at the epoch of the confiscations in question. Whatever might be the origin or foundation of that Government, it had for some time been established. It had obtained such obedience as in such times was customary, and had manifested itself, not only by active internal exertions of legislative and executive powers, but by important external transactions with old and indisputably regular Governments. It had been (as long afterwards it continued to be) recognised by the greatest potentates as one of the European family of States, and had interchanged with them Ambassadors, and other public Ministers and Consuls. And Great Britain, by an Order in Council of the 26th April, 1809, which modified the system of constructive blockade promulgated by the orders of November, 1807, had excepted the Neapolitan territories, with other portions of Italy, from the operation of that system, that neutrals might no longer be prevented from trading with them.

Such was the state of things when American vessels were tempted into Naples by a reliance upon the passports of its Government, to which perfidy had lent more than ordinary solemnity, upon a declaration, as explicit as it was formal and notorious, that they might come without fear, and might depart in peace. It was under these circumstances, that, instead of being permitted to retire with their lawful gains, both they and their cargoes were seized and appropriated in a manner already related. The undersigned may consequently assume, that, if ever there was a claim to compensation for broken faith which survived the political power of those whose iniquity produced it, and devolved in full force upon their successors, the present claim is of that description.

As to the demand itself, as it existed against the Government of Murat, the Marquis di Circello will undoubtedly be the first to concede, not only that it is above reproach, but that it rests upon grounds in which the civilized world has a deep and lasting interest. And with regard to the liability of the present Government, as standing in the place of the former, it may be taken as a corollary from that concession; at least until it has been shown that it is the natural fate of obligations, so high and sacred, contracted by a Government in the full and tranquil enjoyment of power, to perish with the first revolution, either in form or rulers, through which it may happen to pass; or (to state the same proposition in different terms) that it is the natural operation of a political revolution in a State, to strip unfortunate traders who have been betrayed and plundered by the former sovereign of all that his rapacity could not reach—the right of reclamation.

The wrong which the Government of Murat inflicted upon American citizens wanted nothing that might give to it atrocity or effect as a robbery introduced by treachery; but, however pernicious or execrable, it was still reparable. It left in the sufferers and their nation a right, which was not likely to be forgotten or abandoned, of seeking and obtaining ample redress, not from Murat simply, (who, individually, was lost in the sovereign,) but from the Government of the country whose power he abused. By what course of argument can it be proved that this incontestable right, from which that Government could never have escaped, has been destroyed by the reaccession of His Sicilian Majesty, after a long interval, to the sovereignty of the same territories?

That such a result cannot in any degree be inferred from the misconduct of the American claimants, is certain; for no misconduct is imputable to them. They were warranted, in every view of the public law of Europe, in holding communication with Naples in the predicament in which they found it, and in trusting to the direct and authentic assurances which the Government of the place affected to throw over them as a shield against every danger. Their shipments were strictly within the terms of those assurances; and nothing was done by the shippers or their agents by which the benefit of them might be lost or impaired.

From what other source can such a result be drawn? Will it be said that the proceeds of these confiscations were not applied to public purposes during the sovereignty of Murat, or that they produced no public advantages with reference to which the present Government ought to be liable? The answer to such a suggestion is, that let the fact be as it may, it can have no influence upon the subject. It is enough that the confiscations themselves, and the promise of safety which they violated, were acts of State, proceeding from him who was then, and for several successive years, the sovereign. The derivative liability of the present Government reposes not upon the good, either public or private, which may have been the fruit of such a revolting exhibition of power, emancipated from all the restraints of principle, but upon the general foundations which the undersigned has already had the honor to expose.

To follow the proceeds of these spoliations into the public treasury, and hence to all the uses to which they were finally made subservient, can be no part of the duty of the American claimant. It is a task which he has no means of performing, and which, if performed by others, could neither strengthen his case nor enfeeble it. And it may confidently be insisted, not only that he has no concern with the particular application of these proceeds, but that, even if he had, he would be authorized to rely upon the presumption that they were applied as public money to public ends, or left in the public coffers. It must be remembered, moreover, that whatever may have been the destiny of these unhallowed spoils, they cannot well have failed to be instrumental in meliorating the condition of the country. They afforded extraordinary pecuniary means, which, as far as they extended, must have saved it from an augmentation of its burdens; or, by relieving the ordinary revenue, made that revenue adequate to various improvements, either of use or beauty, which otherwise it could not have accomplished. The territories therefore under the sway of Murat must be supposed to have returned to His Sicilian ian Majesty less exhausted, more embellished, and more prosperous, than if the property of American citizens had not in the meantime been sacrificed to cupidity and cunning. It must further be remembered, that a part of that property was notoriously devoted to the public service. Some of the vessels seized by the orders of Murat were, on account of their excellent construction, converted into vessels of war, and, as such, commissioned by the Government; and the undersigned is informed that they are now in the possession of the officers of His Sicilian Majesty, and used and claimed as belonging to him.

The undersigned having thus briefly explained to the Marquis di Circello the nature of the claim which the Government of the United States has commanded him to submit to the reflection of the Government of His Sicilian Majesty, forbears at present to multiply arguments in support of it. He feels assured that the equitable disposition of His Majesty renders superfluous the further illustrations of which it is susceptible.

The undersigned has the honor to renew to his Excellency the Marquis di Circello the assurances of his distinguished consideration.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Monroe.

NAPLES, September 28, 1816.

SIR: My exertions have not yet been sufficient (although they have been unremitting) to obtain an answer to my note of the 24th August; and the season is so far advanced that I fear I have only another week for further exertions. If I do not set out for Russia without delay, I shall subject myself to the hazard of being confined to Italy by rains and bad roads during a great part of the Winter. It is my determination, therefore, to press immediately and finally for a categorical reply to my note, although I am persuaded that the Marquis is in no situation to give it. He must either reply at once, or show why he cannot.

It has been mentioned to me by those in whom I have confidence, that this Government has been extremely perplexed by the demand contained in my note, and has had it under constant and anxious consideration; that, fearing after much consultation to take the ground suggested for it, as I think in America, of irresponsibility for such acts of Murat's Government as my note sets forth, it has been and still is searching for information as to facts; that diligent inquiry, for example, has been made and is yet making, for the original papers of the different vessels and cargoes for which we require compensation, or for such evidence as might supply their place; and that it is probable that in the end an attempt will be made to encounter at least a part of our demand with proof (good or bad) that our case is not altogether such as we suppose it to be in the circumstances.

I am told their search after the papers of the vessels and cargoes is not likely to be very successful; very few—perhaps none—remain; and it is not easy to conjecture what satisfactory or even plausible substitutes they can procure.

I wrote yesterday a private letter to the Marquis di Circello, urging a prompt answer to my note, and desiring that he would tell me, with a view to preparations for my departure, (which of course he knew I could not much longer postpone,) when I might count upon receiving it; but I now think it necessary to demand an interview, with the same object, to take place either to-day or to-morrow. I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Pinkney, Special Minister of the United States at Naples, to Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, dated

NAPLES, October 5, 1816.

On Sunday, the 29th of last month, I had an interview with the Marquis di Circello, in pursuance of the intention announced in my last. I pressed him for his promised answer to my note of the 24th of August, and insisted that, if he could not reply to it immediately, he would name the time within which it was probable he could do so. He said that an immediate answer was really impossible, and that he could not, without running the risk of misleading me, fix any precise time for the giving of such an answer as should be categorical. I asked the reason of this. He observed that the papers relative to the vessels and cargoes, for which we now demanded an equivalent, had, in Murat's time, been scattered about in such a way, that, with all the diligence they could use, they had not yet been able to collect them, or such information as might stand in their place; that all proper steps had been taken by the King's Government for obtaining these papers, and whatever else was connected with and material to our claim, and that they hoped that they would soon be successful; that our claim, apparently of large amount, was made upon those who confessedly had no participation in the transactions upon which it was founded; that, it was, therefore, manifest, they had all their knowledge of those transactions to gain; that they were sincerely desirous of understanding them thoroughly; that, without all the knowledge of the circumstances of the case which could at this time and by due inquiry be recovered, the King could not decide whether he was or was not answerable to us as we alleged; that a decision would undoubtedly be hastened and made known to me as soon as possible, and, as he believed, within a period of time not by any means distant; but that I must perceive that it was not in his power, without practising disingenuousness, to assure me that this could be done in a few weeks. After some further conversation on this point, I told him that I feared I should be obliged to leave Naples before his answer was prepared; and as he knew that my ulterior destination was St. Petersburg, I informed him, finally, that I had determined to set out for Russia on Saturday, the 5th instant, (this day,) unless, by waiting a week or two more, I could be sure of adjusting the business of my mission. He replied, with his characteristic good breeding, that they should be extremely sorry to lose me, and that they had hoped to have me with them for some time, but that, if my duty elsewhere called me away, he would undertake to send the answer to my note, the moment it could be given, wherever I would indicate; that there was no probability that, if I left Naples as soon as I spoke of, or even a week or two later, I should receive the answer here, but that if it could be given so promptly it should. I rejoined that I doubted if, without instructions, it would be well for me to receive the answer after I had left the King's court and territories; that I confidently trusted the answer would admit our claim, (though we had no desire to urge them inconveniently, as to the time or mode of payment, or even to push our demand to its utmost extent,) but that, however little such a result was to be expected, the answer might contest our demand, or an important portion of it; in which case it was both my duty and inclination to reply to the answer, and to maintain, as I did not fear to be able to do, the grounds of fact and law upon which I had already relied; and that this could not be done with advantage, nor, perhaps, with propriety, unless with the approbation of my Government, after my departure for another station.

The Marquis immediately expressed an opinion that I might regularly receive the answer after I had left the Neapolitan dominions; and, in consequence of a question which I put to him in this stage of the conversation, (whether it might not be more in rule to offer to deliver the answer to whom, and to where, the Government of the United States should think fit?) he said that he should have no objection to any course which I preferred, but that he thought it would be best (as being more respectful to me) that he should undertake to send the answer as I should prescribe, especially as this course essentially included the other. It would have been impossible for me to dispute an opinion referred to so civil a motive, even if the matter had been worth disputing.

I did not think, however, that it was worth more words than had been bestowed upon it; and I therefore left the Marquis, to take his own way upon it, reserving to myself the power of taking mine in due season.

In the whole of this conversation (of which I have very shortly stated the import) not a word was dropped by the Marquis condemning our claim, or intimating that it was likely to be rejected, although much of what I said was calculated to provoke him to do so; but again, he said nothing which amounted to an admission that the claim would be acknowledged.

Before I went away, I requested (and he promised) that he would write me a note, expressing briefly what had passed between us; and, the evening of the same day, I received from him a paper (of which a copy is among the enclosures) written and sent in consequence of that request; but, on examining that paper, I found it referred to my unofficial letter, mentioned in my last, and not to our interview; and moreover, it was dated the 27th of September, (perhaps a mistake for the 29th, or possibly my mistake of his figures,) which was antecedent to the interview. I took it for granted, however, that the Marquis had understood me to wish that this mode should be adopted; and, as it was of no importance, I did not put him, as at first I thought of doing, to the trouble of changing it. I therefore founded upon it the three notes, (bearing date, two of them the 30th of September, and the other the 1st of October,) of which copies are enclosed. On the 2d instant I received the Marquis's answer to my note of the 30th of September, which desired an audience of the King; and I took leave, accordingly, on Friday, the 4th instant, one of the days referred by the Marquis's note to my choice, as you will perceive by the copy of it herewith transmitted. The King was polite and kind, and conversed for some time with me on this occasion; but nothing was said by him which had any relation to the objects of my mission.

Having received my passports, my intention is to commence my journey for St. Petersburg in a very few days. Mr. King left me for Russia about a fortnight ago, as my letter of the 18th September informed you he would; and the gentlemen attached to my legation have gone before me to Rome, where I hope to arrive on Thursday or Friday next.

I beg your attention now to a few words upon the course which I have pursued as Envoy Extraordinary to Naples, and upon the actual position and prospects of the claim which produced it. My stay here has, perhaps, been a little longer than was anticipated when I sailed from America; but, upon a careful examination of my instructions, it appeared to me that I was directed by them to make the attempt to obtain an acknowledgment of our claim upon this Government, as full and complete as possible, without sacrificing to it the interests of my mission to Russia. I have done this. As the claim was of great magnitude in a pecuniary sense, involved important principles, and turned upon facts into which those with whom I had to deal had a right to inquire, I could scarcely hope to bring it to an issue of any kind within less than the two months which have elapsed since my first reception here. With regard to my mission to Russia, I have yet made no sacrifice.

Independently of the explanations which I have had, from time to time, with the Count Morenigo, (the Russian Minister here) with regard to my own anxiety, in conformity with the order of my Government, to be in St. Petersburg without delay, those who have experience of the road assure me that, if I had started sooner, I should have been obliged to wait upon the route for the setting in of the frost, and that I should, therefore, have gained nothing.

On the other hand, certainly I could have no apology for protracting my stay in Naples beyond the time to which I have limited it. My instructions, which are precisely what they ought to be, would not justify it. By remaining here a few weeks more, I should postpone for several months, perhaps, my arrival at St. Petersburg, by losing the best season for quitting Italy.

Of the manner in which my negotiation has been conducted I have little to say. Avoiding extremes of every kind, I have sought to write and speak with politeness, but at the same time explicitly and firmly. My object has been to let the King and his ministers understand that the claim must be settled, and to place it upon such ground as to convince them that we are in earnest in considering them as our debtors. Without being studiously conciliatory, I have forbore all menaces.

They have, indeed, treated me and my errand with so much respect, that it would have been difficult for me, even if it had been wise and honorable, to endeavor to force the claim upon them by arrogance and harshness.

I might, indeed, have contrived to display a more active and zealous importunity than my letters will be found to describe; but it could only have been that teasing importunity, which, wanting dignity, and unauthorized by usage, has nothing to recommend its introduction into transactions like this. No proper opportunity has, I think, been missed, to urge this Government to a favorable decision. As to the footing upon which the claim now stands, and the value of its future prospects, it is obvious that much has been gained. It has been presented, (whether well or ill, I dare not judge.) It has been received in a becoming manner, and entertained for deliberation and inquiry. The way to adjustment has been prepared and smoothed. The great principle on which the demand was rested by the Government of the United States is impliedly conceded, and, at any rate, has been greatly strengthened by the forbearance of this Government, not only in limine, but even to the last moment of my mission, to deny it, with opportunity and every inducement to do so constantly presented to it. It was to have been expected, and was expected, that the Court of Naples would resist, at the threshold, a demand which directly, as well as implicitly, asserted its responsibility for the violence and frauds of Murat. It was its true policy to repel such a demand at once, (without reference to details,) if it meant to contest at all the responsibility, upon which the claimants altogether depended, and which formed, in truth, the only dubious part of their case. It was prepared to take that course (as I was well assured) upon my first arrival, yet it has not ventured to take it. On the contrary, it has avowedly busied itself, since the presentation of my note of the 24th of August, in efforts (which cannot be successful) to lay a foundation of fact for distinctions that may give it a chance of escaping from our principle, which finally it declines to question.

The reasons suggested by this Government for a short postponement of its decision are such as I suppose I could not have quarrelled with, without putting myself in the wrong. They are per-feetly respectful to the United States, and of real weight in themselves. Their effect is to leave negotiation open, to give encouragement to resume it, and, at the same time that they impart new solidity to our claims, to render an acquiescence on our part in a brief adjournment of it not only consistent with our honor, but a duty. In the mean time, the two Governments are not brought to a disagreeable issue, as (if the claim had been rejected without ceremony, or even with all the ostentation of civility,) they might have been.

In not consenting to receive the answer of this Government after my departure from Naples, I was a good deal influenced by the apprehension that they might possibly give me such an answer when absent as they would not give me if present. I desired, moreover, to insure to my Government a just control over the subject, and to the claimants a clear stage for their own private exertions. I thought that a more convenient resting point could scarcely be had, and that it would be better that I should afford time to advise upon the case to those who had more right than I to dispose of it in future, than that, adhering to my mission after I had separated myself from those to whom I was accredited, I should risk the loss of everything by the exercise of a very doubtful authority, under all sorts of disadvantages.

The Marquis di Circello to Mr. Pinkney, dated NAPLES, September 27, 1816.

The Marquis di Circello, in reply to the private letter of his Excellency Mr. Pinkney, in which he is pleased to remind him of his official note of the 24th of August last, has the honor to inform him, that notwithstanding the great anxiety of him (the Marquis di Circello) to give the reply which he owes to the said note, he is not yet able to give it, since it must be the result of a reunion and accurate examination of all the information which the subject of that note requires, and for obtaining which orders have been given. This may probably occupy several weeks more, and it is of course impossible for him yet to fix the epoch at which the said reply may be given as Mr. Pinkney desires. The writer, however, assures his Excellency, that in case his situation should not permit him to wait for the said reply, he will make it his duty to forward it wheresoever he may indicate.

In the mean time, he profits of this occasion to have the honor to confirm to His Excellency the assurances of his distinguished consideration.

IL MARCHESE DI CIRCELLO.

Mr. Pinkney to the Marquis di Circello, dated NAPLES, September 30, 1816.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary of the United States of America, had the honor to receive last night the note of his Excellency the Marquis di Circello, bearing date the 27th instant, upon the subject of the note of the undersigned of the 24th of August.

The undersigned certainly regrets that the Government of His Sicilian Majesty has not been able already to honor him with a precise reply to that note; and he regrets still more that, on account of the difficulty of collecting the information supposed to be necessary to a correct decision upon the claim which it preferred, he cannot hope to have such a reply during the time to which he is obliged to limit his present stay in Naples.

He is perfectly sure, however, that the epoch is at hand when His Majesty's Government will be possessed of this information, and when the justice of the claim of the Government of the United States, in behalf of its injured citizens, will be fully perceived and distinctly acknowledged.

The undersigned, in answer to that part of the note of the Marquis di Circello which proposes to send a reply to the note of the undersigned of the 24th of August wheresoever the undersigned may indicate, has the honor to state to the Marquis di Circello, that, upon this point, as well as upon all such ulterior steps as his mission and the subject of it may be calculated to produce, the undersigned will think it his duty to refer himself to his Government, which, at the same time that it will give their due weight to the reasons which are now assigned for a short postponement of the claim in question, will take such measures as it shall think the case requires with regard to the future.

The undersigned takes this occasion to renew to his Excellency the Marquis di Circello the assurances of his distinguished consideration.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary of the United States of America, being about to leave the Court of His Majesty the King of the Two Sicilies, upon the business of his Government, has the honor to request that his Excellency the Marquis di Circello will have the goodness to inform him at what time His Majesty will honor him with an audience.

The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity to renew to his Excellency the Marquis di Circello the assurance of his most distinguished consideration.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary of the United States of America, has the honor to request of his Excellency the Marquis di Circello the usual passports for himself, his family, and suite, and their baggage, &c.

It is his present intention to go to St. Petersburg by the way of Vienna; but it is possible that he may abandon that route in favor of the road through Berlin. He wishes to set out at the end of this week.

He begs his Excellency the Marquis di Cir-

The undersigned, Secretary of State and Minister of Foreign Affairs, in reply to the official note of the 30th of last month, in which his Excellency Mr. Pinkney, Envoy Extraordinary of the United States of America, has requested an audience of His Majesty the King of the Two Sicilies, hastens to inform him that His Majesty will with pleasure receive him at the royal palace in Naples either to-morrow or next day, (as may be most convenient to his Excellency,) at half-past eleven o'clock in the forenoon.

The undersigned renews to his Excellency, &c.
IL MARCHESE DI CIRCELLO.

ST. PETERSBURG, Feb. 27, 1817.

SIR: Notwithstanding the explicitness of my answer of the 30th of September of the last year to the proposal contained in the note of the Marquis di Circello of the 27th of the same month, I had scarcely quitted Naples when he sent after me his reply to my note of the 24th of August. The obstacles which, while I was present, threatened to retard that reply for many a week, and even for months, disappeared with a marvellous rapidity after I had departed; for the reply passed me on the road to St. Petersburg, and arrived there long before me.

The Neapolitan Minister at this Court (to whom it was forwarded by the Marquis di Circello, for the purpose of being delivered to me) manifested immediately upon my arrival here a very anxious desire that I should receive it. He even entreated me to do so, with such earnestness as it was not easy to resist. I refused, however, to have anything to do with his packet, and assigned as my reasons that I had ceased to have any right to meddle with the subjects of my late mission to his Government; that the Marquis di Circello was distinctly told by me, when I found that I must leave Naples without an answer to my note, that I would not continue to correspond with him upon the claim which it preferred, unless I should be instructed to do so by my Government; and that he could not but know, without the help of anybody's information, that it was impossible that I should so soon be in possession of such instructions, even if the President approved of that course, (as it was probable he would not,) for the conclusion of my negotiation.

The Duke proposed finally to write me a letter, importing that he had the reply to my note, and that he wished me to take it. I assented to this, and the short correspondence, of which a copy is enclosed, was the consequence.

If I had been perfectly sure that the reply was a favorable one, and required no further discussion, (which, indeed, I did not understand it to be the intention of the Sicilian Government to indulge me in,) I would have received it. The celerity with which it had followed me, however, suggested the opposite presumption; and the Duke's desultory conversations with me, as often as I met him, (in which he talked, as the Marquis di Circello was wont to do, of the poverty of his master, &c.,) did not weaken that presumption. Certain newspapers, too, professing to speak from authority, had affected to quote the reply as a refusal, which had already been given to me. You will find a republication of one of those articles in the enclosed Conservateur Impartial, and will be satisfied that the Sicilian Government, or its Minister at Vienna or St. Petersburg, has dictated the latter part of it.

Upon the whole, having lost my power to deal with the reply as its contents might require, and fearing it was not what it ought to be, I thought it my duty to insist upon the impropriety of sending it at this moment to me, (an impropriety for which the Marquis di Circello could have no motive that I ought to sanction,) and upon that ground to decline to take it. The Duke has shown uneasiness at this course, and I am not sorry for it. His Government is a good deal disturbed by our claim, and we hazard nothing (and may gain) by practising upon its anxiety within certain bounds, or even to any extent we think fit.

I have the honor to be, with very distinguished consideration, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

HON. SECRETARY OF STATE.

*The Duke of Serra Capriola to Mr. Pinkney.
ST. PETERSBURG, Feb. 7, (19,) 1817.*

SIR: I have received from my Court a note in answer to that addressed by your Excellency to the Marquis di Circello on the 24th of August last, and which it was not possible to deliver you before your departure, on account of the information necessary to be taken relative to the business with which you were charged by your Government.

I have the honor to give you this information, for the purpose of knowing if you are willing to receive it, and take your arrangements for that purpose.

In the meanwhile, be pleased to receive the assurances of the very distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to be, sir, your Excellency's most humble and most obedient servant,

SERRA CAPRIOLA.

Mr. Pinkney's answer to the foregoing.

ST. PETERSBURG, Feb. 20, 1817, (N. S.)

SIR: It would have been particularly agreeable to me to obtain, during the continuance of my functions as the Envoy Extraordinary of the

Relations with the Kingdom of Sicily.

United States at Naples, while I might regularly have taken and acted upon it, an answer to the note which in that character I addressed to the Marquis di Circello on the 24th of August of the last year, and I certainly spared no efforts for that purpose.

I found it impracticable, however, after the importunity of many weeks, to obtain either an answer, or the designation of any precise time within which I might be authorized to expect one; and, as my ulterior duties here would not suffer me to wait at Naples for the issue of inquiries and deliberations, of which avowedly the term could not be foreseen even by those who were engaged in them, I was compelled to leave unsettled the subject of my note and to put an end to my mission.

My power to correspond with the Government of the King of the Two Sicilies upon that subject, or otherwise to assume an agency in it, has consequently ceased, and can only be revived by the President of the United States, from whom I derived it originally, and to whom I have rendered an account of the use which I was able to make of it. Whether it will be his pleasure to renew it in any degree, or in what other way he will think it proper to deal with the subject, I have no means of knowing. I know only that he has yet given me no orders upon it, and that there has not been time for such orders.

The Marquis di Circello must be prepared for this answer to your Excellency's letter to me of the 19th instant if he does me the honor to preserve any recollection of my note to him of the 30th of September last, of which (as well as of his note to me of the 27th of the same month) I shall be very willing to give you a copy if you desire it.

I have the honor to be, with very distinguished consideration, your Excellency's most obedient humble servant,

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

His Exc'y the DUKE OF SERRA CAPRIOLA.

The Duke of Serra Capriola to Mr. Pinkney.

ST. PETERSBURG, Feb. 9, (21,) 1817.

SIR: I received yesterday the letter by which your Excellency has been pleased to reply to that which I addressed to you on the 7th (19th) of this month, stating the reasons by which you consider yourself no longer authorized to receive the note in answer to it, transmitted to me by the Minister of His Majesty the King, my master.

Your Excellency will readily conceive how unpleasant and painful it must have been to the King not to have been able to cause an answer to be given to your note of the 24th of August last, during your mission at Naples; but you are aware, sir, that that answer must necessarily have been founded on documents and proofs not easily procured, inasmuch as the transaction in discussion took place under a Government foreign to the existing one. If this delay was painful to the King and to his Ministry, how much more will it not be on seeing the answer again impeded. I consider it, therefore, my duty, sir, to engage you to receive the packet I am charged with, at least for the purpose of transmitting it to your Government. By this means you will satisfy the wishes of my Government, and make the President of the United States acquainted with the well-founded arguments which might accelerate the termination of this affair.

Availing myself of the offer you have made me, sir, I have to request you would be pleased to favor me with a copy of the Marquis di Circello's letter, and of your answer of the 30th September. You will thereby greatly oblige me, sir; and, in thus tendering you my acknowledgments for it, I seize the present occasion of renewing to you the assurances of the very distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to be, sir, your Excellency's most humble and most obedient servant,

SERRA CAPRIOLA.

ST. PETERSBURG, Feb. 21, 1817, (N. S.)

SIR: It would really give me sincere pleasure to be able to conform to the wish which your Excellency presses upon me with so much earnestness; but I feel insurmountable repugnance, arising out of what I believe to be a correct sense of my duty, to giving any sanction to the making of a communication to me, as if I were still the accredited Envoy of the United States at Naples. I can have no difficulty, however, in consenting to forward to the Secretary of State of the United States anything which, by order of your Court, you may think fit to address to him.

What may be the nature of the packet which has followed me from Naples I do not know, and do not desire to know, further than that it is in answer to a note written by me in an official character which I no longer possess. I have the utmost confidence, indeed, that it proposes a fair indemnity to our plundered merchants, not only with reference to that part of the spoil which, not having been sold by Murat, has passed into the hands of His Majesty the King of the Two Sicilies, and is now in his possession, but with reference also to that larger portion of it which was converted into money. But let it propose what it may, it is not to me that it should address itself, at least until my Government is known to have given me such instructions, which it has not yet had time to give, even if it be disposed to adopt that course, as may justify me in receiving it, and in acting upon it as its contents may require.

The copies which you desire are herewith enclosed. They will satisfy you that the Marquis di Circello ought to anticipate the answer which I now repeat to your application.

I have the honor to be, with the most distinguished consideration, your Excellency's most obedient, humble servant,

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

His Ex. the DUKE OF SERRA CAPRIOLA.

Relations with the Kingdom of Sicily.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Gallatin, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris, to Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, dated

PARIS, November 19, 1816.

I received, on the 16th instant, a note from the Neapolitan Ambassador, enclosing, by order of his Court, the copy of an official note, dated 15th October last, and addressed by the Marquis di Circello to Mr. Pinkney, after his departure from Naples. In answer to a verbal inquiry, the Ambassador told me that he did not know whether that note had been directed to Mr. Pinkney, at St. Petersburg, or at any other place on the road. He also said that his Government had authorized him to add to that communication to me any further observations which he might deem proper, but that he had abstained from it, knowing that neither he nor myself had any powers on that subject, and wishing, therefore, to avoid an unprofitable discussion.

It may be presumed that the Neapolitan Government delayed that note in order to prevent the possibility of a reply; and that their intention in communicating it to me was to hasten its transmission to you. Copies of the official note itself, and of that of the Ambassador to me, are enclosed.

PARIS, November 15, 1816.

The undersigned, Ambassador Extraordinary of His Majesty the King of the Two Sicilies, has the honor to transmit, by order of his Court, to Mr. Gallatin, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, a copy of an official note, addressed by the Marquis di Circello, Minister and Secretary of State of his said Majesty, to Mr. Pinkney, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, in answer to his note of the 24th of August last, on the subject of certain American vessels confiscated in 1809 by Murat.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to Mr. Gallatin the assurances of his high consideration.

CASTELCICALA.

NAPLES, October 18, 1816.

Although the Government of His Majesty the King of the Two Sicilies was from the first moment, in a situation to judge of the validity of the remonstrance and demands made by his Excellency Mr. Pinkney, Envoy Extraordinary of the United States of America, in his note of the 24th August last, nevertheless, wishing to examine and discuss them under all their aspects of right and of fact, it has waited, accordingly, until all the materials and lights were collected proper to this end.

The many difficulties attending the search after those materials, owing to the change in the order of things during which the facts occurred that have given rise to the demands of Mr. Pinkney, rendered it impossible for the Royal Government to reply to the note of his Excellency before his departure from Naples.

Now that the papers and appropriate inquiries have shed the strongest light upon the affair in question, the undersigned, Councillor and Secretary of State, Minister of Foreign Affairs of His Majesty the King of the Two Sicilies, hastens to give, by order of his Sovereign, the following reply to Mr. Pinkney, requesting his Excellency to be pleased to communicate it to his Government.

All the arguments contained in the note of the 24th August look to the end of making His Majesty's Government responsible for the consequences of the confiscation and sale, whether just or unjust, of several American vessels and cargoes, which took place in Naples while the kingdom was held by Murat.

In support of this pretension, it is assumed that the abuse of power and violation of good faith, by which these arbitrary acts were committed, are of such a nature as to survive the political authority of the author of them, and that, of course, as there accrued a right of reclamation against the Government of Murat, there exists one also against the present Government of the Two Sicilies.

His Excellency adds, that although the American claimants have not the means of ascertaining to what uses the produce of the abovementioned sales was applied, yet they may presume that it was expended in works and objects of public utility, or left in the public coffers; and therefore affirms that, under this point of view, likewise, His Majesty's Government is bound to indemnify the victims of the spoliations committed during the ascendancy of Murat.

Without undertaking to inquire whether a sort of succession or inheritance, in legitimate and illegitimate Governments, can be maintained upon good grounds, the undersigned will be content to remark that, whatever may be the opinion of publicists as to this point, no one has ever pretended to visit the injustice of the contracts or deeds of usurpers upon the people subjected to their yoke, or upon the legitimate sovereigns.

That theory would, indeed, be a disconsolate one which should extend the power of an enemy not only to the consequences of fact, but even to those of right. The victory which restored the legitimate prince would be fatal to both, if it must have the effect of making him responsible for the acts of injustice and violence which the usurper might have perpetrated against foreign nations.

It avails not to say that these are of the description of obligations and engagements which survive the overthrow of the usurped dominion, as common to the nation over which that dominion was exercised. This would be the place to determine whether we could reasonably qualify, as an obligation, an engagement from Government to Government, or nation to nation, a mere right of reclamation, which, according to the obligation of Mr. Pinkney himself, the United State, kept in reserve, to be exercised with Murat, had not his power been subverted.

But the undersigned will simply ask his Excellency if that very right is not to be regarded as null, seeing that the continual, strong, vehement demands, officially made by the Consul General of the United States at Naples upon the Minister of Murat, for the restitution of the confiscated vessels and cargoes, or compensation to the American owners, were rejected, or remained without a reply? However this may be, it is always incontestable that it is not against the actual Government of His Majesty that a right, to which he who created it would not hearken, can be tied, as it were, in the nature of an appeal.

It is among the principles of reason and justice, that a sovereign, who never ceased to be in a state of war with the usurper of his dominions, and who, very far from having afforded grounds for presuming that his rights were waived, as is asserted in his note of the 24th August, carried into effect, in concert with his ally, England, a powerful expedition in the islands of Procida and Ischia, nearest to the capital of his usurped kingdom, in the year 1809, precisely that in which the confiscation of the American ships at Naples took place. It is among the principles of reason and justice, that he should not be, on regaining his dominions in process of the war which had compelled him to absent himself from them, held responsible for the excesses of the enemy.

Let, then, the relations of the usurper with the Powers friendly or allied to France have been what they may, the inference which the American merchants may have drawn from them, in relation to the prosecution of their trade at Naples, should not be made to recoil upon the treasury of a sovereign who not only did not show any the least acquiescence in the usurpation, but did all that was in his power, and all that circumstances would permit, to vindicate his abused rights. There is still less foundation for the arguments brought forward in the note of the 24th August to prove that the Neapolitan nation was, in some sort, a party to the measures by which the Americans suffered, and therefore liable, in solidum, for the consequences.

If the inhabitants of the kingdom of Naples could only have signified their wishes, these would undoubtedly have been for the maintenance of relations of justice and friendship with the Americans, the only nation which, by means of its neutrality, might provide a vent for the commodities accumulated through so many years in the kingdom, under the operation of the noted continental system of ruinous memory.

But everybody knows that the Neapolitan nation, prestrated by a foreign domination, was but the mournful spectator and first victim of the arbitrary acts which were daily committed. So far, then, from being able to indemnify others, it would be exceedingly fortunate if she could find means of compensating herself for the losses and immense injuries which she sustained during the occupation of the kingdom.

These considerations would be more than sufficient to prove that the claims of the American merchants cannot reach either the actual Government of His Majesty or his people.

But, to make the demonstration complete, and to exhibit the question under all its aspects, the undersigned will admit, for a moment, the absurd hypothesis, that the present Government of Naples stands in the place of that of Murat, and has succeeded to all his obligations.

The demand of Mr. Pinkney will not be, on this account, the less unsustainable, since the confiscation and sale of the American vessels and cargoes were acts which proceeded directly from the power and from the will of Bonaparte. There exists, in fact, in the archives of the Treasury, a report of the Minister, Agar, who presided over that Department in 1809, addressed to Murat, who was then at Paris.

The Minister relates, in this report, that two American ships had arrived at Naples, one from Salem, the other last from Algiers, laden with colonial produce; and that the necessary orders had been given to put the same under sequestration, conformably to the directions antecedently issued from higher authority, with respect to the other vessels arrived at Naples, before the departure of Murat for Paris.

He proceeds then to point out the great benefit which the treasury would derive from opening the market to the colonial produce lying on board those ships, or in the custom-house of Naples, by the duties which would be collected upon the sale of it, and upon the export of the oils which the Americans would take as return cargoes.

The Minister remarks, in fine, that the confiscation itself of the American vessels and cargoes was but an inconsiderable resource, compared with the very great advantage which would have resulted to the treasury from an active American trade, could it have been tolerated in the ports of the kingdom.

Murat did not deem himself authorized to decide in any way, and submitted the report to his brother-in-law, Napoleon, who decreed, in margin, that the vessels and cargoes in question should be confiscated, because the embargo laid in the ports of the United States induced him to believe that the produce must be British property, and its introduction into the Continent a breach, therefore, of the two famous Berlin and Milan decrees.

On the disclosure of this decision of Bonaparte in Naples, it was ordered, also, that the proceeds of the sales should not be paid over to the treasury of the State, but that a separate and special account should be opened for them, which was done accordingly. In order to understand well this distinction, and to be able to draw from it the consequences applicable to the case, it is useful to note, that during the military occupation of the kingdom, there existed a treasury, so called, destined to receive the public revenues and defray the public charges; and as, among the latter, the support of the luxurious household of Murat was not the least onerous, accordingly the sums allotted to this purpose were paid into the hands of a particular treasurer, who disposed of them as his master directed.

Besides this particular chest, into which, moreover, all the proceeds of the private domain were emptied, Murat established another, by the name of separate account or fund, (conto a parte), as a receptacle for the sums arising from the sale of the vessels and cargoes confiscated in 1809 and 1812, and also for the profits of the licenses which, in imitation of England and France, he sold to the vessels entering and leaving the ports of the kingdom. The new fund was always considered as appertaining to the extraordinary and private domain of Murat himself. An irrefragable proof of this may be offered. The first article of one of his decrees, of 25th April, 1812, is conceived in the following terms: "The commission established by our decree of November 30, 1811, for the purpose of liquidating the accounts of our royal household, is, in addition, charged with examining the accounts of the vessels sequestered in our ports, regarded by us as the property of our extraordinary and private domain."

Besides, it is enough to read the account rendered of the cashier of the separate fund, to know that the sums paid into it were dissipated in largesses to the favorites of Murat, in marriage portions to some of his relatives, and in other licentious expenses of Murat and of his wife, especially during their visit at Paris. It appears, moreover, that Murat having anticipated on said fund a sum of two hundred thousand livres on account of the treasury, towards the cost of the expedition with which, during several months, he menaced Sicily with an invasion from Calabria, the Minister of the Finances lost no time in reimbursing the fund with the proceeds of the public taxes.

From the foregoing statement, two important and obvious consequences are to be drawn. The first is, that Murat only lent his name in the confiscation of American ships, as he did merely in all the other measures pursued in Naples during the occupation of the kingdom. This was no mystery, nor could foreign nations be ignorant of it. Still less could they be unacquainted with the extent of the power which Bonaparte usurped, in order to give all possible latitude of effect to his decrees of Milan and Berlin, in the countries over which he exerted his fatal influence.

Obstinate in his fantasies, absolute in his will, he studied only to enlarge the sphere of his favorite plan. A mere remonstrance on this head, if Murat had allowed himself to prefer one, would have cost the latter his crown. Holland furnished an incontestable example of this truth.

Murat, then, let it be repeated, was but the passive instrument of the will of Bonaparte in the confiscation of the American ships; and if this could give birth to responsibility, such responsibility should no longer be imputed to the country over which he reigned, and still less to the Government which has there resumed its lawful authority.

The other, and not less important consequence, is, that the treasury, which was the fund of the State, never enjoyed the proceeds of the confiscations, and that, instead of being employed to alleviate the burdens of the people, or applied to the improvement or embellishment of the country, as is supposed in the note of the 24th of August, those proceeds only served to feed the caprices and the oriental pomp of the family of Murat and his adherents.

After this rapid and faithful exposition of facts, the undersigned will not enter upon the inquiry whether the American merchants would have been entitled to call for indemnity, if the Power which commanded and executed the confiscation of their property had, unfortunately, continued to flourish.

He will go no further than to remark to Mr. Pinkney, that such a call could not affect the actual Government of His Majesty, nor his people; and his Excellency and his Government are too enlightened and too impartial not to be fully convinced of this, now that they can dwell upon circumstances which perhaps were not previously within their knowledge.

The undersigned renews to Mr. Pinkney, on this occasion, the assurance of his most distinguished consideration.

INDEPENDENCE OF THE SPANISH PROVINCES.

[Communicated to the House, March 25, 1818.]
To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In conformity with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 5th of December last, I now transmit a report of the Secretary of State, with a copy of the documents which it is thought proper to communicate, relating to the independence and political condition of the provinces of Spanish America.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, March 25, 1818.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
March 25, 1818.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 5th December, has the honor of submitting the documents herewith transmitted, as containing the information possessed at this department requested by that resolution.

In the communications received from Don Manuel H. de Aguirre, there are references to certain conferences between him and the Secretary of State, which appear to require some explanation.

The character in which Mr. Aguirre presented himself was that of a public agent from the Government of La Plata, and of private agent from that of Chili. His commissions from both simply qualified him as agent. But his letter from the Supreme Director (Pueyrredon) to the President of the United States requested that he might be received with the consideration due to his diplomatic character. He had no commission as a public Minister of any rank, nor any full power to negotiate as such. Neither the letter of which he was the bearer, nor he himself, at his first interview with the Secretary of State, suggested that he was authorized to ask the acknowledgment of his Government as independent; a circumstance which derived additional weight from the fact that his predecessor, Don Martin Thompson, had been dismissed by the Director Pueyrredon, for having transcended his powers, of which the letter brought by Mr. Aguirre gave notice to the President.

It was some time after the commencement of the session of Congress that he made this demand, as will be seen by the dates of his written communications to the department. In the conferences held with him on that subject, among other questions which it naturally suggested were those of the manner in which the acknowledgment of his Government, should it be deemed advisable, might be made; and what were the territories which he considered as forming the State or nation to be recognised. It was observed, that the manner in which the United States had been acknowledged as an independent Power by France was by a treaty concluded with them, as an existing independent Power; and in which each one of the States then composing the Union was distinctly named; that something of the same kind seemed to be necessary in the first acknowledgment of a new Government, that some definite idea might be formed, not of the precise boundaries, but of the general extent of the country thus recognised. He said the Government of which he desired the acknowledgment was the country which had, before the revolution, been the viceroyalty of La Plata. It was then asked whether that did not include Montevideo, and the territory occupied by the Portuguese; the Banda Oriental, understood to be under the government of General Artigas; and several provinces still in the undisputed possession of the Spanish Government? He said it did; but observed that Artigas, though in hostility with the Government of Buenos Ayres, supported, however, the cause of independence against Spain; and that the Portuguese could not ultimately maintain their possession of Montevideo. It was after this that Mr. Aguirre wrote the letter offering to enter into a negotiation for concluding a treaty, though admitting that he had no authority to that effect from his Government. It may be proper to observe, that the mode of recognition by concluding a treaty had not been suggested as the only one practicable or usual, but merely as that which had been adopted by France with the United States, and as offering the most convenient means of designating the extent of the territory acknowledged as a new dominion.

The remark to Mr. Aguirre, that, if Buenos Ayres should be acknowledged as independent, others of the contending provinces would, perhaps, demand the same, had particular reference to the Banda Oriental. The inquiry was, whether General Artigas might not advance a claim of independence for those provinces, conflicting with that of Buenos Ayres, for the whole viceroyalty of La Plata. The Portuguese possession of Montevideo was noticed in reference to a similar question.

It should be added, that these observations were connected with others, stating the reasons upon which the present acknowledgment of the Government of La Plata, in any mode, was deemed by the President inexpedient, in regard as well to their interests as to those of the United States.

BUENOS AYRES, Jan. 16, 1816.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: The circumstances are well known which have heretofore prevented these provinces from establishing with the United States of America the relations of amity and strict correspondence which reciprocal interest and a common glory ought to have inspired. At length, the obstacles which were opposed to our desires have been overcome, and we have the fortune to be able to send near your Excellency a deputy, to implore from your Excellency the protection and assistance we require for the defence of a just cause and sacred in its principles, and which is, moreover, ennobled by the heroic example of the United States, over whom your Excellency has the glory to preside.

A series of extraordinary events and unexpected changes, which have taken place in our ancient mother country, have constrained us not to make a formal declaration of national independence; nevertheless, our conduct and public papers have sufficiently expressed our resolution. When this letter reaches your Excellency, the general Congress of our Representatives will have met; and I can assure you, without fear of being mistaken, that one of its first acts will be a solemn declaration of the independence of these provinces of the Spanish monarchy, and all other sovereigns or powers.

In the meantime, our deputy near your Excellency will not be invested with a public character, nor will he be disposed to exceed the object of his mission, without an understanding with your Excellency and your Ministers. That these views may be exactly fulfilled, I have selected a gentleman who, from his personal qualities, will not excite a suspicion that he is sent by the Government invested with so serious and important a commission. He is Colonel Martin Thompson, who, independently of this credential, has the title which we are accustomed to give to our deputies. I hope that your Excellency will be pleased to give him full credit, and secure for him all the consideration which, in a like case, we would give and secure to the Ministers whom your Excellency may think proper to send to these provinces.

Independence of the Spanish Provinces.

The said deputy has it specially in charge to offer to your Excellency, in my name, and in that of the provinces under my direction, the profound respect and particular estimation with which we view the very illustrious chief of so powerful a Republic. May your Excellency deign to receive these expressions, and to give us an occasion to accredit them.

God preserve your life many years.

Declaration of Independence of the Provinces of La Plata, communicated by Mr. Aguirre to the Department of State, 24th December, 1817.

We, the representatives of the United Provinces of Rio de la Plata, in general Congress assembled, invoking the Supreme Being who presides over the universe, and calling on heaven, earth, and mankind, to witness the justice of our cause, in the name and in virtue of the authority of the people whom we represent—

Solemnly declare, that it is the unanimous will of the people of these provinces to break asunder all the bonds which unite them with the Kings of Spain; to reinstate themselves in the enjoyment of the rights of which they have been deprived; and to raise themselves to the high rank of a free and independent nation, capable of giving themselves such a government as justice and imperious circumstances may require. Authorized by the United Provinces in general, and by each one of them in particular, to declare and lay them under the obligation to support this independence, we hereby pledge their lives, fortunes, and sacred honor.

Mindful of the respect due to those nations which take an interest in our fate, and conscious of the necessity of declaring the weighty reasons which have impelled us to this act, we resolve that a manifest, setting them forth, be immediately made public.

Given and signed in the hall of our sittings, sealed with the seal of the Congress, and countersigned by our Secretaries, in the city of Tucuman, this 9th day of July, 1816.

BUENOS AYRES, Jan. 1, 1817.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: Being placed at the head of these provinces by the suffrage of the Congress of its representatives, and having had the honor, on a former occasion, of offering to your Excellency the tribute of my respects, and at the same time of transmitting the act of the declaration of our independence of the ancient Government of the King of Spain and his successors, I profit of the present occasion to notify your Excellency that I have ordered Colonel Don Martin Thompson, the agent of this Government near the Government of your Excellency, to cease to exercise the functions appertaining to his character as such. When first sent to the United States, he went in the character of agent; and of this your Excellency was apprized by despatches of the 16th of January of the last year, in which was assigned, as the reason for not having appointed to so important a mission a person of greater consideration and weight, the necessity of obviating all suspicion that might otherwise have arisen concerning its object. It is with much concern that I have learned, by the communications themselves of our said agent, that he has arbitrarily departed from the line of the duties marked out for him, and that, without having duly estimated the honor of conferring with you, he has granted licenses which are in direct contradiction with the said principles. My predecessor rested all his hopes of a favorable issue to the commission given to Mr. Thompson on the generosity and magnanimity of your Excellency; and I, who entertain the same sentiments, venture to hope that, suspending for the present the appointment of an agent, we shall receive proofs of your friendly dispositions towards these people; but if your Excellency should deem it necessary that a formal agent should be appointed, I shall, upon the first intimation, take a particular pleasure in making choice of a person who may be worthy of the consideration of the illustrious chief to whom he will be sent.

I have the honor to avail myself of this occasion to renew to your Excellency the sentiments of respect and high esteem, which it is the boast of the people over whom I preside to entertain for you, and to offer you the like homage in my own name.

May God preserve you many years.

The Supreme Director of the State of Chili, &c. It being important to the maintenance and advancement of the provinces under my command to have therein all those resources of armament which, being useful to the army as well as to the navy, may protect them from invasion, and wrest them from the hands of the enemies of our liberty, I have, therefore, with a view to accomplish the said object, given and granted full power and authority to Don Manuel de Aguirre, to enter into and set on foot all such negotiations as may be relative to the purchase of vessels of war, including a frigate, completely armed and equipped; also, for the purchase of all descriptions of arms, warlike stores, and supplies, useful to the army; it being understood that the value of the different kinds, which he is commissioned to purchase or stipulate for, and the transport thereof to Chili, are to be fully paid for upon due verification of the same, and that, for the fulfilment of this promise, all the interests of the public fund, and of the State of Chili in general, are made responsible.

In testimony whereof, I have ordered the present to be executed. Signed by me, sealed with the arms of this Government, and countersigned by my Minister of State, in the city of Santiago de Chili, this 8th day of March, 1817.

SANTIAGO, IN CHILI, April 1, 1817.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: The beautiful kingdom of Chili having been re-established on the 12th of February last by the army of the United Provinces of Rio de la Plata, under the command of the brave General Don José de St. Martin, and the supreme direction of the State being conferred on me by the choice of the people, it becomes my duty to announce to the world the new asylum which these countries offer to the industry and friendship of the citizens of all nations of the globe.

The inhabitants of Chili, having thus reassumed their natural rights, will not hereafter submit to be despoiled of their just prerogatives, nor tolerate the sordid and pernicious policy of the Spanish Cabinet. In its numerous population, and the riches of its soil, Chili presents the basis of a solid and durable power, to which the independence of this precious portion of the New World will give the fullest security. The knowledge and resources of the neighboring nation of Peru, which has resolved to support our emancipation, encourage the hope of the future prosperity of these regions, and of the establishment, on liberal grounds, of a commercial and political intercourse with all nations. If the cause of humanity interests the feelings of your Excellency and the identity of the principles of our present contest with those which formerly prompted the United States to assert their independence disposes your Government and people favorable towards our cause, your Excellency will always find me most earnestly desirous of promoting the commercial and friendly relations of the two countries, and of removing every obstacle to the establishment of the most perfect harmony and good understanding.

God preserve you many years.

more easy or more pleasing than the maintenance of harmony and good understanding between Powers which are connected by close relations. This seems to be exactly the case in which the United States and these provinces stand with respect to each other; a flattering situation, which gives the signal of our success, and forms our best apology.

It is on this occasion that citizen Don Manuel Hermenegildo de Aguirre, Commissary General of War, is deputed towards you in the character of the agent of this Government. If his recommendable qualities are the best pledge of the faithful discharge of his commission and of its favorable issue, the upright and generous sentiments of your Excellency are not less auspicious to it. The concurrence of these circumstances induces me to hope the most favorable results.

I trust, therefore, that your Excellency will be pleased to grant to the said citizen Aguirre all the protection and consideration required by his diplomatic rank and the actual state of our relations. This will be a new tie, by which the United States of the North will more effectually secure the gratitude and affection of the free provinces of the South.

Don José San Martín, General of the Army of the Andes, to the President of the United States.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: Charged by the Supreme Director of the provinces of South America with the command of the army of the Andes, Heaven crowned my forces with a victory on the 12th of February over the oppressors of the beautiful kingdom of Chili. The sacred rights of nature being restored to the inhabitants of this country by the influence of the national arms and the efficacious impulse of my Government, fortune has opened a favorable field to new enterprises, which secure the power of liberty and the ruin of the enemies of America. Towards securing and consolidating this object, the Supreme Director of the Government of Chili has considered, as a principal instrument, the armament in these States of a squadron destined to the Pacific ocean, which, united to the forces that are preparing in the river La Plata, may co-operate in sustaining the ulterior military operations of the army under my command in South America; and, convinced of the advantages which our actual political situation promises, I have crossed the Andes in order to concert in that capital, among other things, the guaranty of my Government, and, in compliance with the stipulations between the Supreme Director of Chili and its intimate ally, to carry into effect the plan which has been confided to Don Manuel Aguirre. Your Excellency, who enjoys the honor of presiding over a free people, who contended and shed their blood in a similar cause to that in which the inhabitants of South America are now engaged, will, I hope, deign to extend to the above-named person such protection as is compatible with the actual relations of your Government; and I have the high satisfaction of assuring your Excellency that the arms of the country, under my orders, will not fail to give consistency and respect to the promises of both Governments.

I am happy in having this agreeable occasion to pay a tribute to your Excellency of the homage and profound respect with which I have the honor to be, your Excellency's most humble servant,

FEDERAL PALACE, PAMPATAR,

May 21, 1817.—7th.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: The fortune of arms, which decides the fate of empires, and a disastrous combination of circumstances well known to your Government, have interrupted the progress of this Republic, established by a proclamation of the 5th June, 1811, and occasioned the capitulation of the 26th July, 1812, entered into between the Commander-in-Chief of the patriot army, Francisco Miranda, and Don Domingo Monteverde, commander of the Spanish forces, which compact, shamefully violated in the end, has drawn on Venezuela the signal disasters this country has yet to deplore, and of which you have received information through citizens Scott and Lowry, who were eye-witnesses of those events. This has been followed alternately by prosperous and adverse fortune, which this continent has experienced since the year 1812. To this date nothing more propitious has presented itself than the reinstatement of the Federative Government, which was brought about on the 8th of the present month in the city of San Felipe de Carico, within the jurisdiction of the State of Cumana, by the legal proceedings, which your Excellency may perceive by reference to the official documents which, in the name of the Executive department, I have the honor of forwarding to you. And I have to assure your Excellency that, having wrested Venezuela from the hands of the enemies of her liberty and independence in almost every part of the seven provinces of the Confederation, she desires nothing more earnestly than to extend her relations with her brethren of North America, identified as they are by nature, and by political and republican principles, with the great family of the South.

Venezuela, at the first period of its emancipation, deputed to your Republic two of its citizens, John Vicente Bolivar and Talisfero Orea, both furnished with credentials and competent powers to transact all business, and who had it expressly in charge to assure your Excellency of the ardent wishes of the people of Venezuela to make such arrangements as would conduce to the happiness of both nations. The state of affairs in Europe at that period retarded the success which Caracas promised herself by the acknowledgment of her independence by the Republic of the North; but a change having taken place, and a sentiment favorable to our cause extended throughout the continent of Colombia, the Government of this people, whom I represent, does not doubt that your Excellency, taking into consideration the mutual interests which we propose, will give your concurrence, in as far as depends on yourself, towards the establishment of diplomatic arrangements and stipulations, which citizen Joseph Cortes Madariaga has it in charge to open; and, being assured of the noble qualities attached to your Excellency, I flatter myself that our negotiations will be speedily concluded.

The Executive Department has the honor to tender to your Excellency the homage of this Republic, and the high consideration and respect with which, in its name, I remain

Your Excellency's most obedient servant,
FRSO. XAVIER DE MAYS,

CITY OF SAN FELIPE DE CARIACO,
May 8, 1817.

His Excellency General Santiago Marino, second in command of the Republic, having by note called upon the following persons to assemble in a meeting, namely, his Excellency Admiral Luis Brion, commander of the naval forces, the Intendant General Antonio Zea, Joseph Cortes Madariaga, canon of the holy church of Caraccas, Jacobo Xavier Mays, who acted as president of the executive department at the time of the recess of the Congress of Venezuela, Francisco Xavier de Alcala, Diego Valenilla, Diego Antonio Alcala, Manuel Ysaba, Francisco de Paula Naval, Diego Bautista Urbanesa, and Manuel Maneyro, he thus addressed them:

Citizens: Never have I experienced greater satisfaction than on the present occasion, in seeing you truly reunited to deliberate on the most proper measures to be adopted for the safety of our country, under such extraordinary political events, which have induced our illustrious compatriot, José Cortes Madariaga, to attend as supreme chief, in whose name, and at whose request, I have the honor of addressing you as second in command.

The above honorable citizen, José Cortes Madariaga, here present, will explain to you his sentiments and reasons; that you will be able to judge for yourselves whether they be not of such weight as to induce you to institute immediately a provincial Government, without calling together deputies, whose election cannot be effected soon enough, in consequence of the state of commotion and war in which our country is placed.

No one can be ignorant that, in all its reverses, our Republic has not had a firmer supporter or a warmer friend than our incomparable patriot and citizen General Simon Bolivar, all whose designs have been directed to the re-establishment of the representative Government, which the people had fixed upon as their fundamental constitution, but vested with more energy, force, and unity. This has been his most ardent desire, and the object for which he has twice convoked the Congress; the assembling of which, as I have before observed, has been retarded by political machinations and military commotions. But, in consequence of the extraordinary circumstances above alluded to, I have thought proper to do, in the name and at the instance of the supreme chief, what would be done by him if present; and that is, to propose a provisional Government, conformable to the constitution decreed by the Congress of Venezuela. Whilst the deputies to the new Congress are reassembling, he will proceed to make such reforms and modifications as may be deemed necessary in our political institutions. It is on this subject I wish to obtain your sentiments and advice, after hearing citizen Cortes.

Citizen Cortes followed, and observed:

That, animated by sentiments of friendship and attachment towards the South Venezuelans, and their noble compatriots, particularly since the year 1812, he should pass over the series of reverses, in the course of which a multitude of persons, of all ages, sexes, and professions, who, by their numbers, virtues, valor, and wisdom, aggrandized the States of the Confederacy, had been swept away by the calamities of an exterminating warfare, declared and carried on against us by our enemies; and having heard, through the most respectable channel, of the public expression, that the time had arrived when South America should arise, in all its dignity, and declare itself in the face of the world, he had taken a considerable journey, and repaired to this continent from the Windward islands, for the express purpose of imparting to his fellow-citizens the favorable tidings which led him to hope that Venezuela will be included in the common prosperity of South America within the present year; and, by means of its exterior relations, contribute to the inspiring of confidence, and establishing its emancipation on a solid and permanent basis, worthy of this precious portion of the globe. He declared, moreover, that he abstained, through delicacy, from making, on this occasion, certain other reflections of great importance, which he had communicated in his official correspondence with the supreme chief of the republic to General Marino, second in command, and to the admiral of the squadron; and being convinced of their weight and importance, the two latter gentlemen had given proofs of the respect with which they had received his communications. Referring himself to the president as to their contents, he concluded by recommending anew the imperious necessity of the measure, and called for the prompt establishment of the Government.

The Admiral next addressed the assembly in the following manner:

Fellow-citizens and brothers:

Nothing has filled with greater pleasure an adopted son of Venezuela than the presence of this respectable assembly, called together by the second in command, who is vested with the powers of the first, on a subject so important to the salvation of our country; his name from this day will be immortalized, having complied with the wishes of the sovereign people of Venezuela, and fulfilled those of our sovereign chief. I felicitate you, brothers, on so wise a step, and I have the satisfaction of announcing to you, for your own, that the sacrifices which I have made to this day in the service of my country, are nothing in comparison to what I pledge myself to consecrate to it henceforward; convinced as I am that a Government, stable and energetic, by supporting our own force, will likewise induce our foreign friends to extend to us the hand of friendship, and contribute to the maintenance of our liberty and independence. They are already well disposed. They are acquainted with the integrity of my principles. They know that I have not shrunk from any fatigues or exertions in the cause of Venezuela; and, with the aid of the squadron under my command, they only wait to co-operate with your virtue, union, and wisdom, in consolidating the republic and increasing its respectability.

All of the speakers were of a unanimous opinion on the subject proposed, and demonstrated, with great energy, the necessity of immediately establishing the provisional Government proposed by his Excellency; applauding, at the same time, his patriotic determination, and adding, that he would do immortal honor to the republic if he would immediately consent to be installed, and that they should re-establish, as well as circumstances would admit of, the Government of the constitution. They urged, by many important arguments, the political considerations which had rendered this measure indispensable and urgent; and showed, by the most solid reasoning and conclusive references, that the measure was conformable to the unanimous voice of the people, to the upright and well-known wishes of the supreme chief, and to the interests of mankind.

The President then rose, and observed:

Approving as I do of your resolution, and believing it to be conformable to the patriotic views of the supreme chief, and to the sentiments which he has so often expressed in all his proclamations, I declare, in the presence of the Supreme Being and of the people of Venezuela, whom you represent, that the Supreme Congress of the republic is, from this moment, installed; and I resign into your hands the supreme authority, which, by the act passed at Margarita, was conferred, in the first instance, on General Simon Bolivar, and by him on me, acting in his and my own name, in virtue of the republican principles which we both possess, and which equally animate all our friends and companions in arms, who have with so much valor and glory defended the holy cause of liberty and independence. I retire, that you may freely deliberate on what may be most conducive to the safety of the State, requesting you only to hold in mind that my highest ambition is to shed my blood in combatting for the independence of my country, and that I do not aspire to or desire any higher honor from the republic than to contribute, in favor of my friends and fellow-citizens, to the establishment of the blessings of liberty.

His Excellency, being in the act of withdrawing from the assembly, accompanied by the Admiral, Intendant, and the canon Cortes, called upon the officer of the guard, and ordered him to place himself at the disposal of the Congress, the senior member of which proceeded to occupy the seat of the President, and, all the members standing, the oath prescribed by the Federal Constitution, according to the form therein laid down, was administered to them by the citizen and Secretary Diego Bautista Urbanesa, qualified for that purpose. They then entered into a discussion on the various points relating to the object for which the assembly was called, and, after deliberating and agreeing unanimously on all of them—

The citizen President read the following act:

CITY OF SAN FELIPE DE CARIACO,
On the 8th day of May, 1817.

We, the representatives of the United States of Venezuela, Francisco Xavier Mays, deputy to the Federal Congress for the State of Cumana, a member of the executive department, and President of the same (in rotation) at the time of its recess at Valencia, on the 9th of May, 1812, Francisco Xavier de Alcala, Manuel Ysaba, Diego Valenilla, Francisco de Paula Naval, Diego Antonio Alcala, Diego Bautista Urbanesa, and Manuel Maneyro.

On mature deliberation, and with a free will, formally decree: That, from this time, we resume the constitutional character and representation, in the full and absolute possession of which we have been reinstated by the distinguished General Santiago Marino, in the name of the supreme chief of the republic, the meritorious citizen Simon Bolivar, and in his own person, as second chief of the State, and, consequently, at this moment holding in his hands the reins of government; and we make known to all the people of the Confederacy, and call upon the Supreme Being to witness the purity of our intentions, that, from this date, the Federal Government of the republic is reinstated in its three departments, Legislative, Executive, and Judicial, for the requisite despatch of all business to them respectively appertaining; and we therefore appoint, for the administration of the Executive Government, Citizen General Ferdinand del Toro, citizen Francisco Xavier Mays, who were heretofore members of the said department; also, citizens General Simon Bolivar, Francisco Zea, José Cortes Madariaga, and Diego Valenilla; it being understood that the three latter shall exercise the power only ad interim, until the honorable citizens Toro and Bolivar, now absent, shall repair to such city as may be designated for the residence of the Government. To the judicial department we appoint citizens Juan Martinez, José Espana, Gaspar Marciano, and Ramon Cadiz; the latter for the judicial administration.

And as, in consequence of the weighty and momentous considerations which have determined our most excellent fellow-citizens now acting as chiefs ad interim of the Republic, to divest themselves of the attributes of administration, and restore them, through the medium of the Government, reinstated by the indefatigable zeal of both for the salvation of the country, which has thus recovered its political rank, it is necessary that a new oath should be administered to the functionaries and authorities, both civil and military, of the departments that have regained their liberty, and successively of those which shall regain it; and be, in forthwith with those of this city, I name, and appoint to-morrow morning at nine o'clock for them to take the said oath before us; and that proper orders to all public functionaries, absent in foreign countries, be given to present themselves, within the space of thirty days, in the city of Annunciation, the capital of the State of Margarita, which, under existing circumstances, being most conveniently situated, and of the most easy and free access, we name, for the present, the residence of the Federal Government, with the facility of removing the same to any other capital on the continent which may appear most convenient. And if it shall be made to appear that the said public functionaries shall, without just and lawful motives, fail to comply with this summons, they shall, by that act itself, be understood as having forfeited their rights of citizenship, and, consequently, every civil and military right in the Republic.

We finally implore the mercy of the Most High, in the humble hope that he will vouchsafe to protect us; and we solemnly declare, in his presence, and that of all the people of the earth, that the sole object of our unremitting endeavors is to preserve in the enjoyment of peace and liberty the virtuous remains of the great Venezuelan family, saved by the special interposition of his adorable goodness, from the savage fury and destruction of despotism; protesting before him, that our determination is sooner to bury ourselves under the ruins of the Republic, than to return to the slavery and chains we have endured for three centuries, which, after the bright example of our brethren of Colombia, we have broken forever. And be it known to all, that we, the representatives who have hereunto subscribed, are firmly resolved, and do solemnly promise and engage, by all the most sacred obligations which bind in one, both politically and morally, to seal with our blood this our patriotic resolution.

That this act, together with the requisite exposition of the motives which have produced it, be communicated to General Simon Bolivar; and that he be invited, so soon as his military duties will permit, to come and take possession of a station in which he will not fail to render the Republic immortal services, and worthy of his name. That certified copies of this act be transmitted to all the chief officers of the departments, both civil and military; and that the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, and the admiral of the squadron, be notified of the result of the proceedings of the Federal Assembly, that they may concur with the Executive power in taking the oath, and communicating its orders, to the end that the said oath be taken both by the Army and Navy. That it be publicly proclaimed in this city, and all the towns of the federation, and that, by public festivals and rejoicings, the general joy be manifested on the restoration of the national sovereignty under a formal constitution, which, being tempered and modified agreeably to the lights of the age and the lessons of experience, will be the safeguard of our independence and liberty.

Whereupon the sitting closed, and they signed, namely: Francisco Xavier de Mays, President; Manuel Ysaba, Diego de Valenilla, Francisco Xavier Alcala, Diego Antonio Alcala, Francisco de Paula Naval, Manuel Maneyro, Diego Bautista Urbanesa, secretary, with the power of taking the votes.

In the city of San Felipe de Cariaco, this 9th day of May, 1817, the Federal Congress having thus re-assembled, there appeared before it the citizens, the Commander-in-chief of the armies of the Republic, and commander of the armed force, Santiago Marino, and Admiral Luis Brion, who, having taken the oath before the President, and me, the aforesaid Secretary, agreeably to the form prescribed by the federal Constitution of Venezuela, recognised and acknowledged the sovereign authority vested in this body, and other authorities derived from it, promising and engaging to obey and support the federative compact expressed and set forth in the said code. In like manner, the citizen Francisco Xavier Mays withdrawing from the Presidential chair, and the citizen Francisco Xavier Alcala occupying it in his place, the oath was taken in the same form by the three members who are to enter into the discharge of the Executive power, namely, citizen Francisco Xavier Mays, Francisco Antonio Zea, and José Cortes Madariaga, who were thereupon invested with the functions attached to their high office (the two latter in the quality of provisional members) until the appearance of the Generals Bolivar and Toro. And the Assembly having verified this act, and taken into consideration the existing circumstances, declared itself in a state of adjournment, to which the following members subscribed their signatures: Francisco Xavier de Mays, Francisco Antonio Zea, José Cortes Madariaga, Santiago Marino, Luis Brion, Francisco Xavier Alcala, Diego Valenilla, Manuel Ysaba, Diego Antonio Alcala, Francisco de Paula Naval, Manuel Maneyro, Diego Bautista Urbanesa, (vocal secretario) Secretary authorized to take the votes.
